The more anti-government groups exercise economic sanctions as a means to put pressure on the government, the further the goal of democracy inspired by the people will divert from its route, the less opportunity Myanmar people will have to enjoy further social and economic development, and the less public support they will win.

Economic sanctions have adverse effects on democratic process, and the drive to inculcate the people with a democratic sense and expedite the democratization. If the nation lags behind other countries in economic development, the rate of cognitive development of the public will be slow.
