UEC to issue voting tickets to voters ahead of election

Aye Min Soe

THE Union Election Commission announced that it will issue polling tickets to voters to be certified as eligible before election day on 8 November in accordance with the Election Law.

Voters can get their tickets at ward or village sub-election commission posts from 1 to 7 November.

Eligible voters will also be able to cast their ballots on election day without tickets, according to a statement issued on Thursday.

On 19 October, the Shan Nationalities Democratic Party (SNDP) requested that the UEC suspend the election in three townships—Mongshu, Kyay-thee and Tangyang—in eastern Shan State due to conflict between the Tatmadaw and local armed ethnic groups.

A follow-up letter from the SNDP, signed by the party’s general secretary Sai Hla Kyaw, requested that the UEC resume the election in the three townships once stability had been restored.

Locals said that they did not believe the election would be a free election in their areas, as they are currently displaced by the fighting.

About 790 overseas citizens cast advance votes on Wednesday.

Advance voting abroad began on 13 October. The total number of overseas voters up to 21 October reached 22,187.

Polling stations have been established at Myanmar embassies and consulates around the world.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs sent ballots to the country’s 44 foreign embassies to offer more than 29,000 people deemed eligible to vote by the UEC the means to do so.

The UEC requested that organisations involved in the election cooperate with them in the spirit of fairness and political freedom in the upcoming election.

Advance voting in Myanmar will run from 29 October to 7 November, and those eligible to cast advance votes from inside Myanmar include political candidates, local observers, media personnel and departmental officials.

MPs more focused on projects than laws: report

Ye Myint

A RESEARCH paper launched on Wednesday on Local Development Funds (LDFs) has identified a number of concerns regarding the implementation of funds in Myanmar, which are over-shadowing the primary duty of lawmakers.

Parliamentarians have become too focused on the implementation of their CDF projects and are investing less effort in their main duty of passing laws, said Ms Cindy Joelene of The Myanmar Development Resource Institute’s Centre for Economic and Social Development (MDRI-CESD), which is an independent think tank.

She made the remarks during the launch of the report at the Novotel Hotel in Yangon on Wednesday.

Ms Joelene said that the roles and responsibilities of members of the legislative and executive bodies involved in implementing the fund’s projects are unclear.

“As the work of committees formed for project implementation appears to overlap with that of departments concerned engaged in public works, the capacity of ministries and departments is eroded in the long term.”

Another concern, she said, was a possible scenario in which funds could be misappropriated and used for political gain, as well as creating a pervasive mindset of ‘clientelism’ in Myanmar politics.

With the aim of supporting the construction and maintenance of small-scale infrastructure and other development projects, the Constituency Development Fund made its debut in Myanmar in 2013-14 financial year.

The fund has a total amount of K33 billion (US$25.7 million), which is shared equally among Myanmar’s 330 townships, which amounts to K100 million ($78,100) per township.

Climate change affects crop patterns in Nay Pyi Taw

AGRICULTURE Department representatives are pushing for the cultivation of winter crops such as green gram and sesame rather than summer paddies.

The most recent wet season brought little rain to the area, ac- cording to U Myo Naing of the Zeya Thiri Township Agricul- ture Department in Nay Pyi Taw Counci Area.

In their discussions with farmers in the township on Wednesday, representatives of the department pledged assis- tance to farmers struggling to grow winter crops. Most farmers in the area are reliant on water supplied from the Yein Dam, which received just 51 centime- tres of rain this year rather than the expected 127 centimetres.

Had the dam received the expected rainfall, it could have supplied water to around 4,000 acres of summer paddy.

Farmers have been ad- vised to change their crop pat- terns this year in light of the meagre rainfall, which is a re- sult of climate change, said U Myo Naing.—Ko Pauk

Safety comes first in oilfields: energy minister

SAFETY procedures at oilfields and refineries across Myanmar are to be upgraded, while oilfield workers have been instructed to channel their energy into increas- ing overall quality and efficiency.

Production at the Chaik oil- field had stalled for some time, but it is now up and running again, said Union Minister of Energy U Zeyar Aung in a meeting with workers at No. 1 Fertilizer Facto- ry in Sale on 19 October. He also signalled the need to maintain an excellent standard of production at the site and warned against the threat of sabotage.

While visiting the Chaik oil- field hospital, the union minister pledged financial assistance from the ministry’s corporate social re- sponsibility fund.

The union minister later vis- ited the Yenanchaung oilfield, Magway Myanma Telecommu- nications, Mann oilfield and the Haikcharbin oilfield and petrol chemical factory.

Though there may be a change of government every five years, the union minister said, government staff should not en- gage in party politics but should serve the interests of the country.

President delivers speech at opening of Ayeyawady Bridge

AYEYAWADY Bridge (Htigyaing) was officially opened by President U Thein Sein on Thursday.

The president sprinkled scented water over the stone plaque at the bridge during the inauguration ceremony.

Also present were Commander-in-Chief of Defence Services Senior General Min Aung Hlaing, union ministers, the chief minister of the region, deputy ministers and Hluttaw representatives.

Chief Minister U Thar Aye said in his speech that the 7,730-foot bridge took just over five years to construct, which made it one of the fastest projects over the Ayeyawady Region. Construction cost a total of K56 billion.

A town elder thanked the government for the bridge, which will drastically improve the mobility of local communities. The president also said that the bridge is evidence of Myanmar’s successful transition to democracy, as peace and stability allows concrete progress to be made.

He said the benefits of reforms stretch into every strata of life, including economics and administrative matters.

He also said that the recent signing of the nationwide ceasefire agreement will deliver many benefits to Myanmar people, and that the upcoming general election of 8 November represents another historic milestone for the country.

The president said that the government has replaced a heavily centralized system with a people-centred approach on the administrative front and that the government will cooperate with the Union Election Commission to hold the general election, which will be observed by the international community and held in a free and fair manner. The president urged the public to cooperate in holding a free and fair elections.

The president and the senior general later proceeded to Mogok by helicopter, where he inspected Le-in (Mongkwin) project, and continued to Shwebo to inspect the maintenance of Maha Nandar Lake.

The president then paid homage to Maha Aungmyay Hsutaungpyay Pagoda and donated cash. Afterward, the president and party paid homage to monks at Maha Aungmyay Monastery and presented offerings to the monks.

The president and the senior general left Shwebo for Pyin Oo Lwin by helicopter.

Earlier in the morning, the president and the senior general inspected the construction of walls for prevention of water erosion in Katha and paid homage to monks at Dhamma Pala Priyati Monastery before discussing regional development tasks.—Myanmar News Agency

Myanmar, China move to promote trade ties

Myanmar and China held a forum at the Park Royal Hotel in Yangon yesterday morning aimed at promoting trade and investment between the two countries.

During the forum, business representatives discussed opportunities for investment in foodstuffs, agriculture, mining, hydropower projects, real estate and ports.

China is Myanmar’s largest foreign investor, according to the Union of Myanmar Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry (UMFCCI). Myanmar has entered 18 memoranda of understanding with Chinese business organisations.

The Industrial and Commercial Bank of China and the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation (OCBC) recently opened offices in Myanmar in an effort to encourage Chinese investors.

Chinese investors expressed hope that the Myanmar government’s commitment to political, economic and administrative reforms would further encourage investment.—Myat Sandi

Tourists cruise along Ayeyawady River

TOURISTS from Switzerland went took a cruise on RV Thurgau Exotic along the Ayeyawady River on 29 September, according to the Ministry of Hotel and Tourism.

Upland Travels & Tours Co. Ltd organised the cruise along the river, with 18 tourists visiting famous sites such as Yangon, Mandalay, Sagaing and Bagan. They exited Myanmar via Yangon on 14 October.

Similarly, 42 Australian tourists went took RV Sriksetra along the Ayeyawady River on 22 September, visiting several places along the river. They left the country via Mandalay on 29 September. The trip was conducted by Interconnection Travels & Tours Co. Ltd, which also brought 35 Australians on the same cruise along the river on 2 September.

1st Inauguration of Japan’s Yen Loan Project for Rural Development in Taunggyi

ON 22 October 2015, the 1st ceremony of inauguration of the Yen Loan Projects for Local Infrastructure Development took place in Taunggyi, Shan State.

The Government of Japan and Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA) have been engaged in development of key local infrastructure and poverty reduction of Myanmar, following the bilateral agreement signed on 26 May 2013, when His Excellency Mr. ABE, Prime Minister of Japan made his 1st official visit to Myanmar. This ODA Loan Project amounts to JPY 17 billion (approximately USD 170 million) and is the 1st package of Japan’s ODA Loan Projects to Myanmar.

The project aims to newly build and rehabilitate basic infrastructure, namely roads, electricity, water supply, in every region and state. 65 sub-projects are in progress and expected to be completed soon in each region and state.

In Taunggyi, local residents and distinguished guests represented by His Excellency U Sai Aung Myat, Chief Minister of Shan State and His Excellency U Sai Hla Win, Minister of Shan State Development Committee, celebrated the newly built water treatment center in Nar Yaung. Mr. FURUKAWA, second secretary of the Embassy of Japan and Mr. TOKUSHIGE, JICA staff joined to the ceremony. Thanks to this sub-project for water extension of Taunggyi City, the number of households having access to water supply will be doubled to 5,126.

The Government of Japan is willing to further contribute to the poverty reduction and improvement of livelihoods of the Myanmar people both in urban and rural areas. Japan believes such cooperation will help Myanmar to fulfill its vast potential, thus realize inclusive growth and balanced economy in this country. —JICA

Fifteenth Monsoon Forum 2015

THE OPENING ceremony of the Fifteenth Monsoon Forum 2015, jointly sponsored and organized by Regional Integrated Multi-Hazard Early Warning System (RIMES) & Department of Meteorology and Hydrology (DMH) was held this morning at the Yama-Nya Hall Hotel Royal ACE in Nay Pyi Taw. Cambodia eyes bright solar future with tuk-tuks and microfinance

PHNOM PENH — Outside the buzzing Russian Market, one of Phnom Penh’s top tourist attractions, Win Soeun sells coffee from a sky-blue tuk-tuk in the searing midday heat.

The coffee cart, an adapted auto rickshaw, is run by Aziza’s Place, a social business that provides work to women like Win Soeun who used to scavenge at a rubbish dump in the Cambodian capital to make a living for herself and her five children.

Powered by solar panels on its roof, the tuk-tuk is not just part of a project bringing hope to disadvantaged women, but a vivid symbol of Cambodia’s potential to become a solar powerhouse.

The tuk-tuk, which can run at speeds of up to 37 miles per hour (67 kilometres per hour), is the brainchild of Australian company Star8, which recently opened a factory — the city’s first solar-powered building — in Phnom Penh.

With an average of 5.5 hours of sunshine per day throughout the year and high levels of solar radiation even when it is cloudy, Cambodia is highly suitable for solar power, the Asian Development Bank said in a report earlier this year. “The potential for Cambodia to become a solar power is huge, given how much solar radiation you get here all year round,” said Phil Stone, Star8’s managing director. “But the challenges are large, too.”

The falling cost of solar technology, which has dropped in some countries to around $0.13 to $0.15 per kilowatt hour, less than the cost of grid power in many parts of Cambodia, adds to the attraction. But awareness of solar energy and technical know-how are still low in Cambodia, one of Southeast Asia’s poorest nations, Stone said. Cambodia still has a long way to go before it can match the rapid development of neighbouring Thailand, which is largely alone in the region in boosting its capacity to harness the sun’s energy. The Cambodian government, with international assistance, has installed some 12,000 solar household systems — still a small number in a country where only 35 percent of people have access to the electricity grid.

“The government has recently been warming up to the idea that solar is becoming more cost competitive,” Dennis Barbin, Renewable energy market development adviser.

PHILIPPINES — The Philippines said on Thursday two Chinese diplomats suspected of killing two colleagues will be granted diplomatic immunity and handed over to Chinese authorities, following a bizarre restaurant shooting in the central Philippines.

The husband of a Vietnamese woman working at a Chinese consulate in the central city of Cebu shot dead the deputy consul general and a senior staff member during a birthday lunch at the restaurant on Wednesday, police have said.

Consul General Song Ronghua was also wounded in the shooting. His deputy, Sun Shen, was shot in the neck and died. Li Hui, a female finance officer at the consulate, was shot in the head and also died. The suspect was arrested and identified by police as Li Qing Liang. Li’s wife, Guo Jing, who works in the consulate’s visa section, was also held for questioning.

Philippines Foreign Ministry spokesman Charles Jose told a press briefing the couple “shall enjoy immunity from criminal jurisdiction” under the Vienna Convention, and handed over to Chinese officials.

“Upon the request of the Chinese embassy, they are being held by Philippine authorities in Cebu,” he said. “As soon as their security team from Beijing arrives here we will turn over the custody to the Chinese side.”

MANILA — The Philippines said on Thursday two Chinese diplomats suspected of killing two colleagues will be granted diplomatic immunity and handed over to Chinese authorities, following a bizarre restaurant shooting in the central Philippines.

He said the couple will undergo legal process in China and the Philippines respects the couple’s right not to give any statement to local police.

A senior police officer told Reuters no charges had been filed as immunity was being granted.

China’s Foreign Ministry said it was investigating what had happened. Woman Hua Chunying said she had no details to provide.

“We are deeply distressed that this kind of incident has taken place. The relevant situation and reasons are in the process of being investigated and understood further,” she told a daily briefing in Beijing.

Malaysia’s Mahathir faces defamation charge

KUALA LUMPUR — Former Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad is being investigated for defamation over remarks he made against Prime Minister Najib Razak, with the police referring his case to the attorney general for further action, Home Minister Ahmad Zahid Hamidi said in a statement Thursday.

Zahid said the police are investigating Mahathir, 90, under Section 500 of the Penal Code based on two police reports lodged against him.

Section 500 of the Penal Code refers to defamation that is punishable with imprisonment of up to two years or with a fine or both if found guilty.

The police have completed a probe on one of the two complaints lodged.

“The investigation papers have been referred to the Attorney General’s Chambers on 9 October for further instruction,” Zahid said in a written reply in Parliament dated Wednesday but made available to the press on Thursday.

He was answering a question submitted by opposition legislator Tan Kok Wai, who wanted to know the status of the probe on Mahathir, whom he said was “increasingly aggressive” in pressing Najib to resign over a graft scandal.

Federal police chief Khalid Abu Bakar had previously stated that the police were probing Mahathir over a speech he made at an anti-government rally on 30 December, 2011, Kim Jong Un’s erstwhile mentor and uncle-by-marriage.

South Korea’s state intelligence agency reported to the parliament earlier this week that 46 high-ranking North Korean officials, who were mostly based in overseas offices, have fled to the South over the past three years.

China environment bureau says Coca-Cola bottling plant falsified pollution data

SHANGHAI — An environmental protection bureau in northwest China said a police temporarily detained an executive at a Coca-Cola Co bottling facility in Gansu province after it found the facility had falsified pollution data.

In a report on its website, the Lanzhou city office of China’s Environmental Protection Bureau said authorities found Gansu COFCO Coca-Cola Beverage Co Ltd had tampered with data by altering the way it sampled and monitored its sewage output. The news was carried by local media outlets on Thursday.

Police detained at least one of the facility’s executives for five days earlier this month as punishment, the Lanzhou environmental bureau’s statement said.

Coca-Cola officials did not respond to repeated telephone calls and emails seeking comment.

The Gansu facility, part of a joint venture between Chinese food processor COFCO Corp and Coca-Cola, said in a statement that it “attached great importance” to the matter and that an internal investigation had determined irregularities with monitoring equipment led to false data.

“...The company would “rigorously strengthen internal oversight and put an end to the future occurrence of similar issues”, the statement said.

Companies have been scrutinizing to boost their environmental credentials after China introduced tougher regulations this year to combat the country’s unwanted image of smog-choked cities, fouled waterways and heavy-metal tainted soil.

China will ban water-polluting paper mills, oil refineries, pesticide producers and other industrial plants by the end of 2016, as it moves to take severe pollution of the water supply which has left one-third of China’s major river basins and 60 percent of its underground water contaminated.

Senior N Korean security official defected to S Korea

SEOUL — A senior North Korean security official defected to South Korea earlier this year, a Seoul daily reported Thursday.

The State Security Department official, whose rank is equal to that of a Cabinet minister, entered South Korea while traveling abroad on a temporary duty, a source well versed in North Korean affairs told the Dong-A Ilbo newspaper.

The State Security Department is known to have played a key role in the 2013 execution of Jang Song Taek, North Korean leader Kim Jong Un’s erstwhile mentor and uncle-by-marriage.

Japan defence chief inspects inter-Korean truce village

PAJU — Japanese Defence Minister Gen Nakatani on Wednesday visited the heavily guarded truce village of Panmunjom and inspected the Joint Security Area where soldiers from both Koreas face each other.

By visiting the front line of a war that is still technically not over, Nakatani, who arrived in the South on Tuesday for a three-day visit, appeared to be appealing for the necessity of cooperation between Japan and South Korea. “I was able to feel firsthand the state of the Korean Peninsula, which has considerable strain,” Nakatani, the first Japanese defence minister to visit the country in four years and nine months, told reporters.

“I realize the importance of close cooperation between Japan and the United States, and Japan and South Korea,” he stressed.

At a briefing of the situation at the border he received from the South Korean military prior to the visit, he expressed his “respect and gratitude” to the troops for contributing to the peace and safety of the region.

Nakatani also visited the Seoul International Aerospace and Defence Exhibition (ADEX) at Seoul Airport, a military base on the outskirts of Seoul, where he inspected defence equipment including a drone aircraft and an armored vehicle.—Kyodo News

Brunei flight returns to Manila after engine snag

BANDAR SERI BEGAWAN — A Royal Brunei Airlines (RB) flight BI684 which departed Manilla Ninoy Aquino International Airport (NAIA) for Bandar Seri Begawan on schedule last Tuesday local time Wednesday, experienced abnormal readings on one engine shortly after take off, returned to NAIA.

The RB announced Thursday on its official website, “As a safety precaution and in accordance with standard operating procedures, the captain decided to return back to Manila to enable technical checks to be completed.”

The aircraft, a Boeing 787-8 Dreamliner powered by Rolls Royce Trent 1,000 engines, landed back safely at NAIA and all 152 passengers were safely disembarked at the terminal.

Syria air strikes push Putin’s rating to new high: Russian state pollster

WASHINGTON — Whether it’s a fact-finding mission as Republicans insist or the political witch hunt that Democrats anticipate, the congressional committee investigating the deadly 2012 attack on the US diplomatic mission in Benghazi, Libya, on Thursday will hear from Hillary Clinton, then the secretary of state and now the top candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Clinton and many of her fellow Democrats have seized on the comments in recent weeks by Republican lawmakers as evidence that the goal of the Benghazi committee in the US House of Representa­tives was to hurt her seen­er-runner status in the campaign for the November 2016 election. Clinton’s appearance follows months of dismantling reports about her use of a private home­­box email server for her State Department work. The reports emerged in part because of the Benghazi committee’s demand last year to see Clinton’s official records.

Trey Gowdy, the committee’s Republican chairman and a former federal prosecutor, has made the defensive as the most high-pro­file event in his committee’s 17-month existence drew near.

“Shut up” was his advice to Kevin McCarthy, the second most powerful Republican in the House, and others in the party who would draw a link between the commit­tee’s work and Clinton’s declining favorability in opinion polls.

Gowdy says he is focused on a serious inquiry into the killing of J. Christopher Stevens, the US ambas­sador to Libya, and three other Americans by suspected Islamist militants who invaded the US mis­sion compound in the war-torn city of Benghazi with guns, grenades and mortars.

The committee’s five Demo­crats, who may discuss abandon­ing the inquiry after Clinton’s ap­pearance, say they think there is little left to unearth on Benghazi than more than half a dozen previ­ous inquiries did not find.

“I’m looking forward to an­swering questions about the real things when I’m there,” Clinton said pointedly in a television inter­view earlier this month. She voiced doubt at what she said were Rep­ublican admissions that “it’s a political partisan committee for the sole purpose of going after me.”

Gowdy and some of the com­mittee’s six other Republicans say Thursday’s hearing will disp­lay this notion. “The American people will be proud to see that this was a fact-cent­re, mission-focused pro­cess,” Mike Pompeo, a Kansas Republican on the committee, predicted in a phone interview this week. He declined to place any special importance on Clinto­n’s appearance, speaking of it as simply the latest, but not the last, in more than 50 committee inter­views with witnesses.

The hearing is to begin at 10 am ET (1400 GMT) on Thursday. The committee’s Rep­ublicans have asked the State Department to clear for possible public release about 130 docu­ments that the department has supplied to the committee, acc­ording to two people with knowledge of the communica­tions. Most of the documents are either Clinton’s emails with Sid­ney Blumenthal, a friend who served as an unoffi­cial adviser to Clinton and who often sent her long memora­nda filled with pur­tured intelligence from Lib­ya, or communica­tions invol­ving State Department officials about diplomatic security in Libya in 2011 and 2012, the two people said.

A 2012 report by a federal government accounting office that reviewed supposed uses of the UN’s money for the UN Food and Agriculture Organization and the World Food Programme, said famine had not been officially declared because it was hard to get data from conflict zones.

“Treasurers may not exist in the coming months but it may not be possible to validate it at that time due to lack of evidence as the result of limited access to the affected areas and popula­tions,” it said. —Reuters
A test of political maturity

Kyaw Thura

The public will go to the polls on 8 November to select the government they believe has the best potential to get Myanmar back on track. With the election now just a couple of weeks away, political parties have heightened their electioneering by ying with each other for the voters’ attention. The common refrain of who and who isn’t voting is constantly being fed to potential voters by political parties, and as a result even swing voters may now have a particular party in mind for the historic poll. It is encouraging to see that people all over the country have become more dynamic in a political sense than previous generations were. The reason for this is because today’s generation is less naïve and can’t be fooled twice. Another reason for heightened levels of public awareness is that we’re living in the age of information and technology.

After witnessing the benefits of a major shift from the closed-door policy to an open door one, we have collectively come to understand the ways of the world.

Reforms in political, social, economic and educational settings are of paramount importance and we have nothing to lose in making our transition to democracy. After all, the upcoming election is a time for all of us to show the rest of the world that we deserve a robust democracy. Above all else, it is a test of our political maturity.

Unraveling the benefits of yoga

Jojo Yang spent the first 20 years of her life avoiding all forms of exercise. “I was never athletic – I was the last kid picked for sports teams at school because I was small, skinny and uncoordinated,” she told The Global New Light of Myanmar.

It was so determined to skip high school gym class that she used the only loophole that enabled her to day to day by managing the boys’ wrestling team.

Ms Yang took her first yoga class 10 years ago after a friend promised that it wouldn’t be like any other types of exercises in that that she couldn’t ease her body into it.

Ms Yang soon found yoga a natural fit that compensates the physical ailments she spent sitting down as a frequent business traveler – and as a way to pass the time during long journeys spent in hotel rooms. It certainly wasn’t a case of immediate information.

“From the first few years, I was like, ‘I’m not sure I get it.’ I was always asking myself if I was doing it right and I was always trying to match someone else’s pose. It wasn’t until I took a few private lessons that my practice completely transformed,” she said.

The 30-year-old started getting serious about yoga three years ago. She found that if she went a couple of weeks without doing it, she felt the feeling that “something was missing.”

“I woke up every day and felt like the worst day of my life. My job was draining and soul-deadening. No one ever came up to me at the end of the day to give me a hang and say, ‘Thanks for that, you saved my day. You’re a great person or whatever’,” she said.

Ms Yang stayed off to Thai to complete a 200-hour yoga teacher’s course and she and her partner then settled in Myanmar last year. After friends asked that Yangon is “where the action is.”

Within a month of teaching her first class, a student came up to Ms Yang and gave her a hug – she was grateful that Ms Yang’s cues were one and the same. The sole discipline and a host of new disciplines in the western world.

“Fifteen to 20 years ago, yoga was only known as a ‘yoga of the West’ and there is no destination or end point. It’s simply something you can do for the rest of your life.” — Jojo Yang

As someone who never had the confidence to take on traditional sports, Ms Yang is keen to emphasize that everyone can enjoy the benefits of yoga.

The West has in general been raving about yoga is its ability to ease the body into it. Ms Yang said.

“Another common misconception is that yoga isn’t hard enough because it’s not a cardio-based work out. ‘If the poses are done properly, it’s always an effort. And if you breathe properly you will sweat and feel the intensity,’ Ms Yang said.

‘In terms of general wellness, the exercise is just one element. If you really want to get healthy you need to bring it into your diet, how you approach life – stress physically big part in how your physical being is. It’s all connected.’

As someone who never had the confidence to take on traditional sports, Ms Yang is keen to emphasize that everyone can enjoy the benefits of yoga.

Greek dock workers walk out over privatisation

ATHENS — Greek dock workers walked out on Thursday in protest at the planned privatisations of the country’s two biggest ports, a condition of a multi-billion euro bailout from international lenders.

Setting a date to submit binding bids for Piraeus and Thessaloniki ports is one of the actions that Athens needs to conclude its first bailout review and unlock more funds for its 86 billion euro bailout.

Shipping ministry officials said the industrial action did not appear to be disrupting traffic at the ports.

A statement from the dock workers’ labour union vowed to avert privatisations and accused the government of attempting to sell out to “foreign owned monopolies”.

“Ports should be developed by utilising own capital, through credit facilities and tapping European Union funds,” it said. Mission chiefs of lenders are in Athens to assess compliance with bailout terms.

China’s Cosco Group, Danish container terminal operator APM Terminals and Philippines-based International Container Terminal Services, which were shortlisted in an expression of interest process, have until 30 October to submit binding bids for a 51 percent stake in OLP.

But Greek government officials told Reuters this month that snap parliamentary elections on 20 September had held up work on the deadline for sub-bids and that the government would extend the deadline for sub-bids by about 20 days.

Greece would also push back the submission of binding bids for Thessaloniki port to the end of March from early February, the head of the country’s privatisation agency said last weekend.

Eight firms, including APM Terminals and Russia’s state railway company, have been shortlisted for the Thessaloniki port.

Privatisations have been a key part of Athens’ efforts to develop its state assets and raise money to cut Greece’s mountainous debt. The programme has raised only 3.5 billion euros since 2011 versus an original target of 50 billion euros in the 2011-2015 period.

Greece will miss this year’s target of 4.4 billion euros in privatisation receipts but a 3.7 billion euro target for next year is realistic, the head of its privatisation agency told Reuters last month. —Reuters

Hungary’s Orban urges EU migration debate, sees threat to democracy

“This destabilises European democracies,” he said. “We need to start the debate about the future of our continent honestly, without the muzzles of ‘political correctness’, without pretence, talking straight.”

“We need to listen to the people and incorporate their views in our politics. If we can’t do that, we’ll have a political crisis on top of our migrant crisis.”

He said Hungary’s border fence had been meant to turn migrants back from Europe, not divert them along a different path to Germany, and that he had asked Hungary’s Balkan neighbours to help send the migrants back.

“The right thing to do is not to ensure their passage into Europe but to take them back to the refugee camps they started out from,” he said.

“The further they come from their troubled countries, the more difficult it will be for them to return. Therefore these people must remain (in their region) and humane conditions must be created for them (there).” —Reuters

Palestinians keep up attacks in Israel as Kerry seeks to calm violence

As Israeli security forces and civilians become ever more jittery, a Jewish seminary student mistaken for an attacker was shot dead by soldiers on Wednesday at a busy intersection in Jerusalem, police said.

An Eritrean migrant was shot by a security guard and beaten by an angry crowd of Israelis in the town of Beersheba on Sunday. He died in hospital of his wounds, and four suspects alleged to have participated in what Israel’s defence minister termed a lynching were due to appear in court on Thursday.

On Wednesday, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon held talks with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. But after two days of discussions in the region, there was no sign Ban had made progress towards bringing both sides back from what he described as a “dangerous abyss”. —Reuters

BUDAPEST — Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orban urged European leaders late on Wednesday to narrow immigration policies and involve voters in a debate about the continent’s future, saying they would otherwise face a political crisis and a threat to the democratic order.

Hungary has responded to the largest migration wave Europe has seen since World War Two by building a steel fence along its borders with Serbia and Croatia, a step both welcomed and criticised by various leaders around Europe.

The fence has sealed Hungary’s borders but caused a growing backlash in Balkan countries which are struggling to usher them on to Germany through Slovenia, which has already asked for the European Union’s help.

Hungary’s ruling centre-right Fidesz party has taken a hard line against the tide of immigrants fleeing war and poverty in the Middle East and Asia, most of them refugees from Syria’s civil war. It has spoken of a threat to Europe’s Christian and democratic way of life and demanded action from the EU, which is deeply divided on the issue.

Orban, who was due to address the European People’s Party congress in Madrid on Thursday, told the state television channel m1 that European leaders had no mandate to let hundreds of thousands of migrants enter the EU with little or no control.

Hungarian Prime Minister

JERUSALEM — Israeli police said they shot dead a Palestinian and wounded another on Thursday after the two stabbed a Jewish seminary student near Jerusalem on Thursday, as diplomatic efforts to calm three weeks of violence intensified.

US Secretary of State John Kerry and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met for talks in Berlin, where the Israeli leader is on an official visit. A State Department spokesman said Kerry was seeking practical ways to stem the bloodshed.

Describing the morning attack in the town of Beersheba, police said the two Palestinian assailants from the occupied West Bank stabbed the student at a bus stop. He was taken to hospital, as was the surviving attacker.

Nine Israelis have been killed in Palestinian stabbings, shootings and vehicle attacks since the start of October. Forty-nine Palestinians, including 25 assailants, among them children, have been killed in attacks and during anti-Israeli protests.

Among the causes of the turmoil is Palestinians’ anger at what they see as Jewish encroachment on the al-Aqsa mosque compound in Jerusalem’s walled Old City. The compound is Islam’s holiest site outside Saudi Arabia and is also revered by Jews as the location of two ancient Jewish Temples.

Netanyahu has pledged to maintain a decades-old status quo at the compound that bans Jews from praying there and has denied Palestinian allegations that he intends to change the arrangement.

As Israeli security forces and civilians become ever more jittery, a Jewish seminary student mistaken for an attacker was shot dead by soldiers on Wednesday at a busy intersection in Jerusalem, police said.

Mediterranean diet linked to healthier ageing brain

NEW YORK — Following a Mediterranean diet rich in fruits, vegetables, legumes, whole grains, fish and healthy fats may preserve a more youthful brain in old age, a US study suggests.

Previous research has connected a Mediterranean diet to a reduced risk of developing Alzheimer’s disease and other degenerative brain conditions, noted lead study author Yian Gu of Columbia University in New York.

For the current study, researchers focused on elderly people with normal cognitive function to see if the diet might also be tied to losing fewer brain cells due to aging, Gu said by email.

“Among cognitively healthy older adults, we were able to detect an association between higher adherence to a Mediterranean-type diet and better brain measures,” Gu said. To understand the relationship between the diet and brain health, Gu and colleagues reviewed surveys that 674 elderly people completed about their eating habits and then examined magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) scans of their brains.

Compared to the people who didn’t regularly follow many aspects of the Mediterranean diet, the participants who adhered to this way of eating more often had larger total brain volume, as well as more grey matter and white matter.

Higher fish intake and lower meat consumption, one aspect of a Mediterranean diet, was tied to larger total gray matter volume on the brain scans.

Eating less meat was also independently associated with larger total brain volume. Overall, the difference in brain volume between the people who followed a Mediterranean diet and those who didn’t was similar to the effect of five years of aging, the researchers conclude in the journal Neurology.

One limitation of the study is that it can’t show whether the diet actually causes less brain atrophy over time, the authors acknowledge. For instance, it’s also possible that the effect might operate in the opposite direction, with differences in brain structure resulting in behavioral differences that include dietary habits. It’s also hard to separate the effect of eating more fish from the impact of consuming less meat, noted Dr. Victor Henderson, a neurology and health policy researcher at Stanford University in California.

“Someone who eats a lot of fish probably doesn’t eat a lot of meat,” Henderson, who wasn’t involved in the study, said by email. “Other research suggests that it is not just fish and meat that are important,” he added.

Prior research on the Mediterranean diet has suggested that supplementing this diet with additional extra virgin olive oil may strengthen the connection to better cognitive function, Henderson noted.

For example, a long-term Spanish study linked a Mediterranean diet with extra nuts and olive oil to improved memory in older adults in a report published earlier this year. — Reuters

Einstein wouldn’t like it: New test proves universe is ‘spooky’

LONDON — The universe really is weird, which is bad news both for Albert Einstein and for would-be hackers hoping to break into quantum encryption systems.

Eighty years after the physicist dismissed as “spooky” the idea that simply observing one particle could instantly change another far-away object, Dutch scientists said on Wednesday they had proved decisively that the effect was real.

Writing in the journal Nature, researchers detailed an experiment showing how two electrons at separate locations 1.3 km (0.8 mile) apart on the Delft University of Technology campus demonstrated a clear, invisible and instantaneous connection.

Importantly, the new study closed loopholes in earlier tests that had left some doubt as to whether the eerie connection predicted by quantum theory was real or not.

Einstein famously insisted in a 1935 scientific paper that what he called “spooky action at a distance” had to be wrong and there must be undiscovered properties of particles to explain such counter-intuitive behavior.

The idea certainly confounds our day-to-day experience of the world, where change only appears to occur through local interactions. But in recent decades scientific evidence has indeed become “entangled”, so that no matter how far apart they are, they will always be connected.

The first suggests that particles could somehow synchronize behavior ahead of time, while the second implies that testing might detect only a subset of prepared entangled pairs.

To prove their case, the team led by Delft professor Ronald Hanson used two diamonds containing tiny traps for electrons with a magnetic property called spin. They measured all entangled pairs across 1.3 km separating two laboratories.

The experiment effectively closes a chapter in an 80-year scientific debate, but Hanson said it also had important implications for the future, since sophisticated cryptography is already using quantum properties to guarantee data security.

Such quantum encryption systems will only be 100 percent secure, however, if all loopholes are closed, as in the Delft system. “Loopholes can be backdoors into systems,” Hanson told Reuters. “When you go loophole-free then you stop extra layer of security and you can be absolutely certain there is no way for hackers to get in.” — Reuters

Genetic help explain promising showing for GSK malaria vaccine

LONDON — Scientists have found a genetic explanation for why the world’s first malaria vaccine is not very effective in protecting some African children against the deadly mosquito-borne disease.

The analysis, published in the New England Journal of Medicine on Wednesday, comes at a critical time for the experimental shot from GlaxoSmithKline, when global experts are assessing how it might be deployed.

GSK’s Mosquirix, also known as RTS.S, is specifically designed for use by African babies and toddlers. While it has the potential to help prevent many cases of malaria, researchers have been disappointment ed by its limited efficacy.

Hope it could, however, come true when data was to be the last study in 2011 and 2012 showed it reduced episodes of the disease in babies aged 6-12 weeks by only 27 percent, and by about 46 percent in children aged 5-17 months. Now scientists have discovered that genetic variability in a protein found on the surface of malaria parasites may help explain the patchy response because, while the vaccine comes in different forms, GSK’s vaccine incorporates only one variant.

The new study, funded by the US National Institutes of Health, looked at blood from 6,000 youngsters and found that the vaccine’s performance differs depending on how the pathogen when toddlers were infected with parasites with a different protein variant to the vaccine.

GSK said the research was interesting but early-stage.

“This single study is too small to offer conclusive evidence for how RTS.S should be deployed,” a spokeswoman said. “However, the work underscores how a full and comprehensive catalog of the genetic variability of key pathogens could inform the design of clinical studies in the future,” she said.

Experts advising the World Health Organisation (WHO) have been meeting in Geneva this week to draw up recommendations on how the vaccine could be used. — Reuters
El Niño brings drought, hunger to Indonesia and South Pacific

KETUNG MIRI VILLAGE — Rice is so central to life in this tiny mountain village in Indonesia that Ngadimin uses the harvests as his calendar.

The weathered farmer breaks the year into harvests. There’s the first harvest, then the second, with a growing season of alternative crops in between. It hasn’t rained since “the second rice,” said Ngadimin, who uses just one name like many Indonesians.

That harvest was about two months ago, before Indonesia was hit with one of the worst droughts in five years, causing plants to wilt on the stem, and water levels to drop to precarious levels. His fields would normally be flooded this time of year, but the dried, cracked earth is evidence of drought, and Ngadimin has had to switch to crops that don’t need much water.

“We plant rice during rainy season, but (now) we are planting chili,” he told IRIN.

Local rice production was down 20 percent at the last harvest in Ketung Miri, according to the village chief, Sugianto, and it could be months before farmers can plant again. Farming communities throughout Indonesia are struggling with drought as rising sea temperatures associated with this year’s El Niño weather phenomenon affect rainfall across the globe. Governments in Papua New Guinea, Tonga and Samoa report similar situations as the region struggles to cope with what is shaping up to be the worst El Niño event since 1997-1998, when the weather phenomenon caused sugarcane harvests to fail and closed schools in nations across the South Pacific.

Indonesia’s disaster mitigation agency estimated that 8.5 million people were affected by drought conditions in 84 provinces affecting some 22 million people. It warned that November’s onset of the rainy season would likely be delayed into next year.

The Indonesian government announced plans this month to resume rice imports by the end of the year as national rice stocks, battered by the drought and an increase in subsidised rice hand-outs for the poor, continued to drop. In a typical year, the planting season would already be under way, but in villages like Ketung Miri, fields remain fallow or stocked with secondary commodities like tobacco, chili and corn that require less water than rice. Indonesia’s poor and middle class remain particularly vulnerable to price shocks. According to World Bank data, nearly 100 million people hover around the poverty line. Nationwide, the UN World Food Programme estimates that 37 percent of children under the age of five are chronically malnourished.

“I am concerned about what might happen if the rains don’t come,” said Anthea Webb, the WFP representative in Indonesia.

“This is such a big country with such an important rice culture that if there are impacts on production, when prices are already very high, I would be very worried about the nutritional situation, which is quite precarious compared to other countries in the region.”

Webb said she was most concerned about those living in the Indonesian archipelago’s underdeveloped eastern provinces like East and West Nusa Tenggara where many of the country’s most vulnerable people live.

“They tend to have difficulty meeting their own needs when production is at the best of times,” she said.

The situation is worse in the island nations of the South Pacific, according to the regional office of the UN’s emergency aid coordination body OCHA. Fiji is experiencing serious water shortages, with the local government making emergency deliveries to 67,000 people, or 13 percent of the country’s population. Government officials estimate that sugarcane production has fallen 25 percent as the drought began. Tropical cyclone Pam battered the nation of Vanuatu, destroying water tanks and decimating crops across the country.

Emergency response teams estimate that more than 90,000 people are in need of food and water deliveries, especially in the country’s hard-hit regions like North Tanna, where food shortages have already claimed at least one life.

It’s been at least two months since rain fell in most affected South Pacific countries, raising concerns that the region may be in need of long-term humanitarian aid through the coming year, explained Sune Gudnitz, regional Pacific office head of OCHA. “That is a long time for people to go without water or food crops,” Gudnitz said.

“Communities, governments and humanitarian partners need to prepare now for a long road ahead,” she said.

Brazil gives SBM ultimatum in $250m bribery settlement

BRASILIA — Brazil has told Dutch SBM Offshore NV, the world’s top oil production ship lessor, to agree soon to a $250 million bribery settlement if it wants to regain its biggest client in the world’s largest oilship market, a government source told Reuters.

The ultimatum gives SBM several days to sign a leniency deal that includes financial reparations and other clauses such as cooperation with a corruption investigation. The settlement, which has been under negotiation for months, would lift a ban on the Amsterdam-based firm from bidding for new business with Petrobras, Brazil’s state-run oil company. Petrobras, whose officials were accused by Brazilian prosecutors of accepting bribes from SBM representatives in order to win contracts, will receive the proceeds of the deal, gaining badly needed cash to finance expansion and pay debt, the largest in the oil industry. Petrobras officials were not immediately available for comment.

SBM had no immediate comment on the matter.

The government source, who asked not to be named because he is involved in the negotiations, told Reuters on Wednesday that an agreement was very close but there remained a 50-50 chance of the talks folding over difficulties related to a few final clauses.

“We have negotiated endlessly and we gave them an ultimatum: Either we finish now or we break off talks and the company will be penalized,” the source said.

The official did not detail the stumbling blocks but he said negotiations had been particularly complex because they involved several parties, including the Comptroller General’s office, which is the main negotiator, as well as Rio de Janeiro state prosecutors and Petroleos Brasileiro SA, as the oil company is formally known.

The source confirmed that the leniency deal under negotiation involves payment by SBM to Petrobras of about $1 billion (€2.5 billion), part of which would be paid in cash and the rest in services to be provided by the Dutch company to Petrobras. Brazilian prosecutors had accessed SBM of paying millions of dollars in bribes between 1995 and 2003 to secure contracts with Petrobras. Since the corruption scandal emerged, SBM and other suppliers, including construction and engineering firms, have been implicated, resulting in a ban on doing business with Petrobras. — Reuters

Six killed in eastern Congo by suspected Ugandan rebels

KINSHASA — Six bodies were found with stab wounds and bullet holes in northeastern Democratic Republic of Congo on Wednesday, killed by suspected Ugandan Islamist rebels, local and military sources said on Thursday.

The Centre of Study for the Promotion of Peace, Democracy and Human Rights (CEPADHO), a local activist group, said the bodies were found in the village of Kamakombu, more than 30 kilometers (19 miles) north-east of the territorial capital of Beni.

CEPADHO said in a statement it believed the victims were killed by fighters from the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF), an Islamist group founded in Uganda that has operated primarily on the Congolese side of the border for the last two decades and is active in smuggling trade in minerals and timber.

A commander of Congolese army operations against the ADF, who spoke on condition of anonymity, confirmed the death toll and presumed ADF involvement, adding that the bodies were heavily decomposed.

Zimbabwe’s Mugabe warms to West as economy wobbles

HARARE — Robert Mugabe’s anti-Western rhetoric has been conspicuous by its absence of late, a sign the 91-year-old leader has mellowed or realized that Zimbabwe may need financial help.

A year ago, the veteran turned to “old friend” China, but behind the official warmth Beijing made clear the days of blank cheques were over, forcing Harare to make repayments on $1 billion of loans made over the previous five years. Since then, the southern African nation’s economic plight has worsened and Mugabe said he may need the support of foreign creditors such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which he likened in 2006 to “the devil” and “a political monster.”

“The economy is in such a dire state and Mugabe’s rapprochement with Western donors is a realization that he has very few options — even if he may have personal misgivings and it goes against his political beliefs,” said John Robertson, a Harare-based economist.

The government is forecasting growth of 1.5 percent this year but many analysts say Zimbabwe is tilting towards recession — its first since 2008, when hyperinflation clocked 500 billion percent and Mugabe lost his first ever election.

Deflation has taken root as consumer demand shrinks and the economy struggles with a shortage of dollars. Once bustling factories in Harare are now dusty shells, devastated by the 1999-2008 recession that cut GDP by about half.

In addition, the mines are reeling from the fall in commodity prices and a drought has left 16 percent of the population needing food aid. Formal unemployment stands at more than 80 percent and power shortages are getting worse.

“This is the worst since 2008. The economy looks very bleak and there is a lot of negative sentiment,” said Anthony Hawkins, economics professor at University of Zimbabwe’s Graduate School of Management who predicts a 1 percent contraction this year.

German police warn of racist attacks on pro-refugee politicians

BERLIN — German police warned on Thursday of a growing risk of racially motivated attacks on politicians by far-right-wing radicals angry about an influx of migrants, and said crimes directed at refugee shelters were rising dramatically.

The warning comes five days after Germans were shocked by the stabbing of Henriette Reker, a mayoral candidate in the city of Cologne. She was stabbed in the neck and seriously wounded on the eve of Sunday’s election, which she won.

Germany is struggling to cope with the arrival of an expected 800,000 to 1 million migrants this year, many from war zones in the Middle East, and politicians are openly worrying about a potential rise in right-wing radicalism. The BKA federal police said in the third quarter alone, 285 offences were reported against asylum-seekers’ shelters, compared with 198 for the whole of last year. The crimes included arson, criminal damage and incitement.

So far this year, 576 crimes on refugee accommodation were reported. The BKA said there was also an increased risk of aggression towards “people perceived as responsible, for example politicians or people who run the shelters”.

Justice Minister Heiko Maas said in a statement: “The rise in xenophobic violence is shameful for our country.”

The future is here! Fans celebrate ‘Back to the Future’ day

LOS ANGELES — When Marty McFly travelled to the future in the 1989 “Back to the Future” sequel — to 21 October, 2015, to be precise — he was greeted by flying cars, self-tying sneakers and hovering skateboards.

The futuristic items were from a distant world for the time-travelling teenager on a journey from 1985 to 2015 to save his children.

But that day finally arrived on Wednesday, dubbed “Back to the Future Day” as fans of the blockbuster trilogy around the world celebrated the movie milestone.

Social media sites were ablaze with talk about the sci-fi adventure, cinemas held special screenings of the film and companies jumped in on the hype with savvy adverts.

US President Barack Obama tweeted: “Happy Back to the Future Day, @realmikefox! Ever think about the fact that we live in the future we dreamed of then?

That’s heavy, man.”

At the Houston, Texas headquarters of DeLorean cars, whose gull-winged DMC-12 model was adapted in the film into a time machine, crowds gathered to mark the anniversary.

“A lot of people are getting their cameras out and taking pictures,” DeLorean Motor Co CEO Stephen Wynne told reporters.

“When we opened... at 8 o’clock this morning, a woman ran in and she was dressed as Marty McFly and everybody goes, ‘woah!'”

In Canada, a playful recall announcement on the official Health Canada website said that “a certain DMC-12 car converted into a time machine, a defect in the flux capacitor could lead to inability to travel through time. Doc Brown will affect repairs.”

New Bond ‘Spectre’ plays like a swan song, and a long one

LONDON — It may be no coincidence that Agent 007’s latest love interest, played by French actress Lea Seydoux in the new James Bond movie “Spectre,” is called Madeleine Swann, because the film seems like a swan song for some of the participants.

Both Daniel Craig, playing Bond for the fourth time in the film screened for the press in London on Wednesday, and director Sam Mendes, in his second outing for the now 24-film franchise, have been widely reported as saying they want out.

Craig has even gone so far as to say he would rather slit his wrists than play Bond again.

In the ways of the movie world and successful franchises — the last Bond film, “Skyfall”, raked in some $1.1 billion at the box office worldwide - all that could change come Bond 25.

But this slick but overlong, at well over two hours, outing that takes viewers on an armchair journey from Mexico City to London to Rome to Austria to Tunisia and then back to London, has a somewhat tired feel about it, as if it had overgorged on a diet of Aston Martin cars, Omega watches and Belvedere vodka — among the main product placements.

Michael Wilson, a coproducer of the film, said onstage at a central London screening in advance of the British premiere next week that he hoped the press would tweet opinions, but not spoilers. The film, though, trumpets roughly within the first half hour — so no spoiler here — that the high-rise, high-tech offices of a new uber intelligence agency being created in London, which will make double-0 agents like Bond superfluous, has been paid for with private funds — a heavy hint of what is up.

In other scenes, Mendes and the scriptwriters have had fun, referencing scenes from gangster and crime-steepled films like “The Untouchables” for an underworld boardroom ghastliness — to “The Italian Job” where Bond’s latest Aston Martin supercar and an Audi replace Minis careening down steps in Rome.

There is a ring which will unite them all, as in “The Lord of the Rings”, but saying what it will unite and why — that would be a spoiler.

That leaves Bond and his villains — in this case the Austrian Christoph Waltz, reprising a Bond villain of the past — but there are 23 previous films, so that is no spoiler — and his Bond girls.

There are three, but the only one who makes an impression is Seydoux, who gets a great catwalk moment in the dining car of an “Orient Express”-style train, wearing a mostly not-there dress.

Which brings us back to the Seydoux character’s name — Madeleine Swann.

This film, with its villain from the past, and Bond rummaging back in time for answers to the film’s mysteries, is riffing on the French author Marcel Proust, one of whose main characters was Swann and whose memories of childhood were triggered by eating a sweet madeleine cake.

That is no spoiler, but unfortunately it also may be one of the film’s best takeaways, and surely literary allusions are not what audiences want from a Bond film.—Reuters

Hrithik yet to take call on Nikhil Advani’s ‘Bazaar’

MUMBAI — Director Nikhil Advani said Hrithik Roshan has not walked out of his next project “Bazaar” and the actor is yet to give the final nod.

Gossip mills were abuzz that Hrithik had walked out of the project after Nikhil’s unsuccessful attempt to get Austrian Christoph Waltz in the cast.

“Hero” and “Katti Batti” director Nikhil Advani has been trying for actor Hrithik Roshan for a long time.

Adele tweets new album is ‘25’, no release date set

LONDON — British singer Adele announced on Twitter on Wednesday that her new album, her first in four years, would be called “25”.

The winner won six Grammy awards for her 2011 album “21” and an Academy Award for the theme song for the last James Bond movie, “Skyfall”.

“My last record was a break-up record, and if I had to label this one, I would call it a make-up record,” Adele said in the statement posted on Twitter, which did not reveal a release date.

“Making up for lost time. Making up for everything I ever did and never did,” she added.

The singer, who gave birth to her first son, Angelo, in October 2012, has followed a pattern of naming her albums for her age at the time she has created them, having called her debut album “19”.

“25 is about getting to know who I’ve become without realising,” she said in the post. “And I’m sorry it took so long, but you know, life happened.”

Adele records for the independent British label XL. Her album “21” surpassed the 11 million sales mark in the United States, according to Nielsen Soundscan, and was only the 12th album to reach that level since Soundscan began tracking the market in 1991.—Reuters

Yangon Redesigned, a community project that encourages Yangon residents to think critically about design, has launched a competition to find the most creative thanaka artist in the city. Thanaka enthusiasts can enter by posting selfies to the Yangon Redesigned Facebook page. The contestant with the most inventive thanaka face (or body) art will win a custom portrait by one of the lovely designers! The competition ends on 30 October.

You could be transformed like these handsome humans.

More than 20 members of the Yangon Ultimate Frisbee club held a series of friendly matches at Shwe Hin Tha Resort at Nwe Saung Beach on 17 and 18 October to celebrate life in general. Once a secret well-kept by North American teachers, Yangon’s finest frisbee club gradually opened its doors to journalists, entrepreneurs and humanitarians over the previous fiscal year. The group meets at the practice fields opposite Thuwanna National Stadium every Tuesday at 4:45 pm. Newcomers of all skill levels and vocations are welcome.

The final matches and award ceremony for the Myanmar Open Chess Tournament were held at Aung San Indoor Stadium in Yangon on 22 October.

Soe Min Kyaw from the Ministry of Environmental Conservation and Forestry won the tournament with 9 victories in 11 rounds. Nay U Kyaw Tun from the Ministry of Home Affairs was the runner-up, and Saw Win Aung Tun Yangon was the second runner-up. The contestants were awarded either a trophy or a cash prize.

Below the top three winners Thet Naung from Mandalay Region placed fourth, Tha Min Hlaing placed fifth, Kyaw Lin Naing placed sixth, Htay Min Lwin placed seventh, Sithu Myo Naing placed eighth, Win Thu placed ninth, and Myo Naing placed tenth. These contestants also received awards at the ceremony.

“I did my best to prepare for this tournament. I studied books and followed instructions from the guides. I tried hard. I am so happy to have won this prize,” said winner Soe Min Kyaw.

Participants in the Myanmar Open Chess Tournament who came in tenth place or above will qualify to enter the 42nd Myanmar National Chess Championship in 2016, and those who came in 20th place and above will be offered free registration at the Myanmar International Open Chess Tournament 2015 at the Central Hotel in Yangon in November. Contestants who placed 21st to 30th the tournament will be eligible for a 75 percent discount on registration for the Myanmar International Open Chess Tournament 2015. Players that placed 31st to 40th are eligible for a 50 percent discount.

Man United prepare for Van Gaal’s test against City

LONDON—Manchester United and Manchester City must switch their focus from the Champions League to the Premier League when they meet at Old Trafford on Sunday in a derby that Louis van Gaal says will show whether United are true title contenders.

United face City after labouring to a 1-1 draw with CSKA Moscow in the cold Russian capital on Wednesday while City make the short trip across town basking in the glow of their late 2-1 home win over Sevilla.

United must be ready because their manager Van Gaal believes a win for his side is vitally important.

“We have to be more consistent so next week when we win against Manchester City then we can say ‘OK, now we think maybe about title aspirations’,” the Dutchman said after last week’s 3-0 win over Everton.

However Arsenal could be top for the first time in nearly two years by the time the two Manchester clubs meet on Sunday if they beat Everton on Saturday evening.

Arsenal have been in electrifying form recently with three successive wins including a 3-0 victory over Manchester United and a 2-0 Champions League win over Bayern Munich, and now face an Everton side, eager to put last week’s defeat by United out of their minds.

With nine matches played, City top the table with 21 points, followed by Arsenal and United on 19, with West Ham United a further two back on 17.—Reuters

Competitive climbers hope the sport makes Olympic grade

American rock-climbing wizard Alex Honnold insists he would not compete in the Olympics even if his sport gets the nod for inclusion in the 2020 Tokyo Games.

It is not that Honnold does not care for the Olympics or does not like to compete. The man widely considered the best free climber of his generation says he just is not good enough.

“The real reason I wouldn’t compete in the Olympics is just because I wouldn’t even be able to qualify,” the 30-year-old Honnold told Reuters, the day before a climb in the Patagonia region of Chile. “Competitive climbing is basically a whole different sub-sport.”

“I’m more of an adventurer: lots of travel, lots of new routes outdoors, not so much training inside. I can’t climb at nearly the level required for competition.”

While Honnold enjoys scaling the famed El Capitan in California’s Yosemite National Park or tackling Borneo’s formidable Mount Kinabalu, he says a timed ascent of a mammoth mountain does not interest him.

Sport climbing is one of five sports recommended for inclusion in the Olympics by organizers of the 2020 Tokyo Olympics, along with skateboarding, surfing, baseball/softball and karate.

Under new rules, Olympic host cities can pick sports for possible inclusion at the Games in addition to the existing 28 core sports.

The International Olympic Committee must approve the addition of sport climbing and the other recommended sports.

Competitive climbing, of which sport climbing is one of the disciplines, secured a foothold in Europe in the early 1980s and then gained traction in the United States a decade later.

Now, it is gaining a following in other parts of the world.

“It makes sense to put the sport into the Olympics, where it’s more on the world’s stage and people can get a really good idea of what this thing is,” said Tyson Schoene, head coach of the five-time US champion Vertical World climbing team, based in Washington state.

“It’s really popular right now, and not just with young kids. College-age kids also love it. And older. And here in the Seattle area, it’s grown enormously in the last five years.”

Schoene said the sport is appealing because it combines fun with a full workout.

“It has very little to do with hard training for climbing. It’s something that gets your body active and uses all these muscle groups you’ve never really used before,” he said.

“And it’s different. It’s not like putting on your running shoes and running around the lake, where you’re bored to death. It’s interesting, and that’s why it’s grabbing folks.”—Reuters
