President attends Children’s . . .

The President also thanked respective organizations for their cooperation in holding the Children’s Literature Festival in Nay Pyi Taw and the Nobel Myanmar Literature Festival in Yangon.

Myanmar folktales, Myanmar children’s poems and children’s literature are the ones that will survive for us who were brought up in Myanmar rural areas, he said.

These kinds of literature plant seeds of patriotism in us, uplifting our spirits and encouraging us to serve the country and the people, and it can be said that we came to possess the spirit of courage to overcome any difficulties in our lives, he added.

The President also pointed out that technology spreads quickly and, with greater access to some kinds of games and content, contribute to bad attitudes and behaviours, and the way we speak can deteriorate overnight.

“For these reasons, it will not be easy to organize them to learn to love reading and enjoy living in the environment of reading rooms,” he said. “I hereby urge our people to make concerted efforts to make the future of our children brighter.”

In conclusion, President U Htin Kyaw said that the development of children and the development of children’s literature and libraries can have a great impact upon the country’s future. Therefore he wanted to urge all to help in this task. He also wanted various organizations to provide assistance and cooperation so that children will become familiar with literature and find enjoyment in the literary environment.

Afterwards, the President and the First Lady inspected the exhibition room in commemoration of Sayagyi Min Thu Wun, a Burmese poet, writer and scholar who helped launch a new age literary movement called Khit-San Sarpay (New Age Literature) in Myanmar. He is also father of President U Htin Kyaw.

FITs most vulnerable to traffic accidents

Free Independent Tourists (FITs) are more vulnerable to traffic accidents than other tourists who visit Dawei, Taninthayi region, said Dawei region tourist safety police. An FIT is an individual or small group traveling and vacationing with a self-booked itinerary. They are not members of traditional guided tour nor part of a marketed package. These tourists are more likely to rent local transport or meet with an accident. "Our police mostly help FITs with loss of passports and traffic accidents," said Tin Naung Win, an official from Dawei region tourist safety police unit.

A traffic accident occurred in January 2017 and in 2016, five cases of accident occurred. All the cases involved FITs.

"We issued letters of instruction to hotels and guest houses to hire the motorbikes only to those holding international and local driving licenses," said an official from Dawei town hotel and tourism department.

The Dawei tourism safety police unit was formed in March 2015. Currently, four policemen patrol daily in the downtown area and twice a week in areas outside the city. —Myanmar News Agency

Hospital invites pregnant women with diabetes to join free healthcare plan

PREGNANT women with diabetes may join a free medical care programme provided by Yangon’s North Okkalapa General Hospital every Friday, according to the hospital.

Dr Aye Cho, a diabetes specialist from the hospital, said the hospital continues to offer medical examinations and treatment to women who have contracted with diabetes during pregnancy free of charge, urging those patients to come to the hospital’s out-patient department every Friday.

Medical professionals are giving suitable instructions and care a plan in order for patients to have a safe and healthy pregnancy, which includes monitoring the health of them and their babies.

Healthy diet, regular physical activity, maintaining a normal body weight and avoiding tobacco use are ways to prevent or delay the onset of diabetes.

According to a study, diabetes has been found in one out of 100 pregnant women.

According to the World Health Organisation, the number of people with diabetes has risen from 108 million in 1980 to 422 million in 2014. The prevalence of diabetes has been rising more rapidly in middle- and low-income countries. —200

Myanmar, Japanese companies to farm eels for export

MYANMAR is set to increase its exports of farmed eels to Japan, the world’s biggest consumer of the fish, under a joint venture between companies from the two countries.

Under an agreement between Myanmar’s Anawa Devi Fishing & General Trading Co-op Ltd. and Daiichi Koutsu Sangyo Co., a major Japanese taxi operator (торт) and Daiichi plans to invest $1 million in the project while Anawa Devi will provide land, research and other basic infrastructure. The project will start on an 1-hectare plot of land at Yangon Paik Village in Dala Township, a southern part of Myanmar’s business hub Yangon.

Last November, the two companies formed a new firm, Anawa Devi Daiichi Joint Venture Co., to manufacture fish fillets and value-added fishery products.

Tee Nandar Tin said the new business is also an attempt to establish eel cultivation in Myanmar, which mainly depends on capture fisheries for eel exports.

“We have lack of technology on eel farming,” she said. “The drop in eel exports indicates that there are lesser fish stocks in nature as well and we need to cultivate eel for export rather than depending on capture fisheries.”

added Tee Nandar Tin, who is also the chair of the Myanmar Eel Entrepreneurs Association.

Myanmar mainly exports mud eels, which are particularly popular in China. The country used to export 12,000 tons at a maximum in the past, but was able to export only 7,000 tons last year and set the same export target figure for this year due to the lessening fish stocks.

Tee Nandar Tin said there is huge potential for level-finned eels in other markets besides China, as they are similar to Japanese eels.

According to a 2015 research report on Myanmar’s inland fish farms, the fish farming industry grew rapidly over the past 10 years, posting an estimated 250 percent increase in fish farm output from the Delta region, which accounts for 90 percent of farmed fish in Myanmar.

Anawa Devi started its fishing business in 1977 and later expanded into food processing in 1997. It has pioneered the cultivation of hybrid catfish—crossbred between channel and blue catfish—in Myanmar. It also exports fish fillets to Australia. —Kyodo News

PYEONGCHANG, (South Korea) — South Korean and US Marines are conducting military exercises on ski slopes in sub-freezing temperatures, including shirtless hand-to-hand combat in the snow, prompting warnings of retaliation from North Korea over “madcap mid-winter” drills.

More than 300 Marines are taking part, simulating combat on the ski slopes of Pyeongchang, host of the 2018 Winter Olympics, amid speculation North Korea could be planning another missile test in defiance of UN resolutions.

“US Marine Corps and ROK (Republic of Korea) Marine Corps partnered together at every level to build a camaraderie and friendship of the two countries’ militaries but also to increase our proficiency in the event where we have to fight a war together,” US Captain Marcus Carlstrom told reporters.

The training began on 15 January and ends on 3 February in Pyeongchang, about 180 km (115 miles) east of Seoul.

About 28,500 US troops are stationed in South Korea in joint defence against North Korea, which is under UN sanctions over a series of nuclear and missile tests and which regularly threatens to destroy the South and the United States.

Poverty-stricken, reclusive North Korea and the rich, democratic South are technically still at war because their 1950-53 conflict ended in a truce, not a peace treaty.

James Mattis, in his confirmation hearing as US defence secretary, described “the Pacific theatre” as a priority and analysts expect new US military spending under President Donald Trump to strengthen the US presence in Asia.

Topping US concerns in the region are North Korea’s nuclear weapons and missile programmes and China’s military moves in the South China Sea.

South Korean Defence Minister Han Min-koo said on Friday North Korea’s nuclear weapons and missiles were “a direct and substantive threat” and ordered thorough military readiness, Yonhap News Agency said.—Reuters

Singapore must renew economy to stay relevant to the world: Singapore PM

SINGAPORE — Singapore must renew its economy to stay relevant to the world as well as maintain vibrant and prosperous, said Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong on Friday in his Chinese New Year Message 2017.

Lee wishes all Singaporeans a Very Happy Lunar New Year via the message. As New Year is a time for thanksgiving and reflection, he urged Singaporeans to take a longer look back, to remind them how far the nation has come and what contribution the earlier generations have made in the past.

Lee said one important area of renewal for Singapore is the economy. Singapore must continue economic restructuring especially at this moment when there is such uncertainty in the global environment.

Singapore’s economic growth was sluggish last year, although it picked up towards the end of 2016. He hopes the pickup will continue through this year, he said.

“In Singapore, we have always grown by renewing ourselves, taking our economy in fresh directions, opening new markets and fields of business. That is how we have stayed relevant to the world, vibrant and prosperous,” said Lee.

The prime minister revealed that the Committee for the Future Economy will deliver its report soon, setting out strategies for growth in the next 10 to 15 years.

“There’s no point in having a Committee: Government, businesses and workers all play their part, coming together to plan ahead, support one another and seize new opportunities,” Lee said.

Thailand jails man for 11 years for royal defamation, cyber crime

BANGKOK — A Thai military court on Friday jailed a man for 11 years and four months on charges of royal defamation and computer crime over his Facebook social media posts last year.

The country’s strict lese-majeste law makes it a crime to defame, insult or threaten the king, heir to the throne or regent. Each offence is punishable with a jail term of up to 15 years.

Burin Inth, 28, pleaded guilty to two charges of royal defamation and violating Thailand’s Computer Crime Act over posts deemed insulting to the monarchy in a comment on Facebook and online chat, his lawyer, Anon Numpa, said.

He was detained on 27 April last year after taking part in a peaceful protest against the country’s ruling junta, and held on remand in Bangkok, the capital, since 30 April.

Anon said he would not appeal against Friday’s decision, but would submit a petition for a royal pardon.

Last month, Thailand’s new King Maha Vajiralongkorn pardoned or commuted the sentences of up to 150,000 prison inmates, including some jailed under one of the world’s toughest laws against royal insult.

Spate of Australia shark attacks could take a bite out of tourism

SYDNEY — A series of shark attacks off Australia’s northeast coast has given the tourism industry the shudders, prompting a controversial deployment of protective nets to save lives and guard the country’s reputation as a holiday destination.

Australia ranked behind only the United States in the number of unprovoked shark encounters with humans last year, the International Shark Attack File of the University of Florida shows.

There have been 16 attacks in the last two years, data from the Shark Research Institute shows, including one death, off the coast of New South Wales, a region favored by tourists for its proximity to the international gateway of Sydney.

“When I surf, I always think about sharks,” French tourist Alexandre Monteiro, 22, told Reuters. “Mostly when it’s cloudy, or when the water is not clear.”

The tourism industry, which supports one in three jobs and brings about A$1.7 billion into the regional economy, hailed the federal government’s use of a national interest exemption to permit shark nets on five beaches over the busy summer months.

“Whenever there is a life at stake something needs to be done,” Cameron Arnold, chairman of tourism body the North Coast Destination Network, told Reuters.

Current environmental laws ban such nets, but a decades-long netting programme in heavily-populated areas such as Sydney and northern Queensland dates from before the laws were adopted.

While closely watched by businesses at holiday sites around the nation, the new shark nets have sparked heated debate over their usefulness and the harm they cause to marine life. “We will see humpback whales, mothers and calves, getting entangled in the nets,” said Jeff Hansen, managing director of conservation group Sea Shepherd Australia. “We’re going to see an increase in turtles, rays and seals trapped and killed in these nets.”

The nets, about 150 metres (164 yards) long and six metres (7 yards) deep, stretch along roughly 200 km (124 miles) of coast between the cities of Newcastle and Wollongong. Only the South African province of KwaZulu-Natal has a netting programme on a similar scale.—Reuters

Many airports in Japan fail to meet safety norms for runway overruns

TOKYO — Runways at three quarters of the airports in Japan, including the country’s busiest gateways Narita and Haneda, do not meet safety standards to prevent severe accidents when planes overrun, according to the transport ministry.

The “runway end safety area” should extend at least 90 meters from the end of a runway strip, but this requirement is not met at 73 out of 97 airports nationwide, the Ministry of Land, Infrastructure, Transport and Tourism told Kyodo News on Friday.

Last week, an All Nippon Airways plane skidded off a runway after landing at New Chitose Airport in Hokkaido. No one was injured and the plane avoided serious damage after it plowed into snow in the safety area, indicating it was sufficient to mitigate an accident.

The ministry has set up a review team and is expected to draw up a plan by March to promote installations of required safety areas. If no space beyond runways can be secured, the ministry may consider shortening runways or introducing a system to forcibly decelerate planes.

The government safety standards were established in 2013 but a total of 75 runways at the 73 airports did not fulfill the criteria as of the end of 2016. They include the shorter of the two runways at Narita, where expansion has faced opposition from local land owners, and one of the four runways at Haneda, which is stretched close to the sea leaving no further space for the safety area.

22 killed in rain-related accidents in Pakistan

ISLAMABAD — At least 22 people were killed and scores others injured in separate rain-related accidents in Pakistan over the last four days, local Urdu media and officials said on Friday.

The country’s southwestern Balochistan Province was the worst hit area as 17 people were killed and 18 others injured in separate incidents of rain and snowfall, said the Provincial Disaster Management Authority of Balochistan on Friday.

The authority said that most of the casualties happened due to roof collapse incidents in Sherani, Quetal, Mustang districts and provincial capital of Quetta.

In the country’s northwest Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province, five people were killed and several others injured when their vehicle fell into a ravine due to slippery roads after heavy downpour, local Urdu TV channel Dunya said.

Balochistan province received the heaviest downpour over the last four days where 44mm rainfall was recorded.

Home Minister Balochistan Mir Sarfaraz Bugti said that road route of several districts including Ziarat and Kalat to other areas have been blocked due to heavy snowfall, stranding the residents inside their houses at various places.

He said that a large number of mud houses collapsed in Khudabad area of Kalat district, rendering the residents homeless, adding that the provincial government is distributing relief items among snowfall-affected families and is making all-out efforts to facilitate the victims.

He added that Pakistan Army Aviation also provided two MI-17 helicopters on the request of Balochistan government for carrying out relief operation in snow-hit areas of Kalat division.

Local weather office said that the current spell of rains in the country is almost over and cold and dry weather is expected in most parts of the country from Friday.—Xinhua

Indonesia detains former finance official for suspected IS links

JAKARTA — A former Indonesian finance ministry official has been detained on his return home after being deported from Turkey for trying to cross into Syria on suspicion of intending to join Islamic State, Indonesian authorities said on Friday.

Police identified the man as Triyono Utomo and said he was detained along with his wife and three children after they arrived back in the Indonesian island of Bali on Wednesday.

The finance ministry issued a statement to “clarify media reports about an ex-finance ministry official” being detained, but it did not give his name.

“He was a former civil servant at the finance ministry,” the ministry said, adding that the man had held a junior position and had resigned in early 2016, saying he wanted to set up an Islamic school on the outskirts of the capital, Jakarta.

“No legal assistance will be provided to him,” the ministry said. Utomo and his family were in detention on Friday and not available for comment. It was not clear if he had a lawyer.

National police spokesman Rikwanto said Utomo and his family would be held for questioning for seven days, and it would then be decided whether or not to proceed with the investigation. Media said Utomo had studied for a post-graduate degree in Australia.

Hundreds of people from Indonesia, the world’s largest Muslim-majority country, have attempted to travel to Syria in the past few years. Some have been on humanitarian missions, some trying to join militant groups including Islamic State.

Last year, four men linked to the group mounted a gun and bomb attack in the heart of the capital and killed four people.

MYANMAR has been the focus of international attention in recent weeks as unrest in Rakhine State has made headlines around the world. Observers have been quick to make graphic assertions, with reports claiming widespread atrocities. The government has been accused of indifference to the plight of the people of Rakhine. Our leader, Aung San Suu Kyi, who has fought so hard for democracy, has been accused of standing by in silence.

This could not be further from the truth. The government is fully alive to the situation in Rakhine and has already taken steps to address the issues and restore peace and stability. I have been appointed to the new role of national-security advisor precisely to ensure the safety of everyone in Myanmar, and in response to international concern regarding Rakhine in particular.

I am totally committed to ensuring that the country is safe and secure. I care deeply about all the people of Rakhine, and undertake to protect them.

It is time that we pause to separate truth from fiction, however, before rushing to condemn. The situation in Rakhine State is complex and challenging. Serious mistakes have been made over the years, leading to fear and distrust, compounded by chronic underdevelopment. There is no denial that the Rakhine people have suffered, as have the Buddhist Rakhine, who fear they are becoming a minority in their homeland.

We have a responsibility to provide hope for all the people of Rakhine. But to do this, we must focus on resolving the problems, rather than merely reacting. The situation is not helped when people deny the very real challenges we face.

The International Crisis Group recently acknowledged we are witnessing a new radicalized and armed insurgency in Myanmar, funded and inspired from abroad. This is a worrying and dangerous escalation by forces that do not have the interests of these communities at heart, but use them as pawns in their game.

It is made worse by propaganda and misinformation. Recently, horrific stories have been carried by media internationally. One showed burrowing footage of a child being tortured, supposedly by Myanmar security forces. But this happened in Cambodia, not Myanmar.

Let me be clear, there is no excuse for excessive force, for murder or rape. Where there is evidence, we will act on it. For example, we moved swiftly to detain police officers after a video emerged showing security forces committing abuses against Muslim Rakhine. We have also established a national committee to investigate alleged abuses, drawn from the Muslim and Buddhist communities.

A number of sources indicate that we are seeing a sophisticated campaign designed to discredit and destabilize the Myanmar government. To counter this, we must focus on real, lasting solutions to real problems.

That is why we have established an independent commission, headed by former United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan, which will assist our government in finding solutions. Aided by the U.N. and others, we are providing humanitarian assistance to build stability in the region. I believe that this independent approach is the way forward, allowing us to deliver a better future for the people of Rakhine in a united Myanmar.

Finally, what is happening in Rakhine cannot be seen in isolation. It is just over a year since our first democratic elections in 50 years. We are working hard to build peace, prosperity and a democratic future.

Our leader, Aung San Suu Kyi, was held under house arrest for 15 years before the election, and we have had to learn the virtue of patience. Democratic change does not happen overnight but is a hard-fought process. While there is much still to do, we must remember how far we have come.

Our greatest national endeavor is to resolve one of the world’s longest-running civil wars. We must ensure that we process our priority, starting a dialogue open to all armed factions. After years of isolation and underdevelopment, we are rebuilding our economy, providing jobs, schools and hospitals.

The world was supportive over the years, but now we must struggle for freedom. I ask only that the international community continue to support us as we strive to overcome remaining challenges, not only in Rakhine, but across our fragile new democracy.

US-Mexico crisis deepens as Trump aide floats border tax idea

PHILADELPHIA/MEXICO CITY — The White House on Thursday floated the idea of imposing a 20 per cent tax on goods from Mexico to pay for a wall at the southern US border, sending the peso tumbling and deepening a crisis between the two neighbours.

Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto announced on Twitter around midday on Thursday that he was scrapping a planned trip to meet with US President Donald Trump, who has repeatedly demanded that Mexico pay for a wall on the US border.

Later in the day, White House spokesman Sean Spicer sent the Mexican peso falling to its low for the day when he told reporters that Trump wanted a 20 per cent tax on Mexican imports to pay for construction of the wall.

Spicer gave few details, but his comments resembled an existing idea, known as a border adjustment tax, that the Republican-led US House of Representatives is considering as part of a broad tax overhaul.

“The White House said later its proposal was in the early stages. Asked if Trump favoured a border adjustment tax, White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus said such a tax would be “one way” of paying for the border wall.

The plan being weighed by House Republicans would exempt export revenues from taxation but impose a 20 per cent tax on imported goods, a significant change from current US policy.

“If you tax exports from Mexico into the United States, you’re going to make things ranging from阿根廷s to appliances to flat-screen tvs, you’re going to make them more expensive,” Mexican Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray told reporters at the Mexican Embassy in Washington on Thursday night.

Countries like Mexico would not pay such taxes directly. Companies would face the tax if they import products made there into the United States, potentially raising prices for American consumers.

The idea is unpopular with retailers and businesses that sell imported goods in the United States. It also has met opposition from some lawmakers worried about the impact on US consumers.

Trump himself appeared to pan the idea in a Wall Street Journal interview last week, saying the House border adjustment provision was “too complicated.”

Even after Trump’s comments, congressional Republicans have continued to discuss the issue with White House officials in an effort to bring them on board with the idea. — Reuters

French presidential candidate Fillon’s popularity dips — poll

PARIS — Some 61 per cent of voters have a negative opinion of French presidential election candidate Francois Fillon, according to an opinion poll carried out after the publication of allegations that he paid his wife for a fake job.

The Odoxa poll shows 38 per cent have a good opinion of Fillon. That is a drop of 16 percentage points since a poll carried out early November by another polling agency, Ifop-Fiducial. Odoxa said in a note.

It’s a four points popularity drop since an Odoxa poll published on 8 January, the note said.

Saritral weekly Le Canard Enchaine reported on Wednesday that Penelope Fillon had been paid some 600,000 euros ($641,640.00)for many years of employment as a parliamentary assistant to Fillon, then to his replacement as a lawmaker and also for work at a cultural journal.

Fillon denies any wrongdoing and has called the allegations “abject.”

Aust’n PM calls for safety measures in wake of deadly Bourke Street car attack

CANBERRA — Australia’s Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull on Friday called for the installation of safety barriers at Melbourne’s Bourke Street Mall to help avoid a repeat of the deadly car attack which killed five people last week.

More than 30 pedestrians were injured and five people, including an infant, were killed when a man drove his car down the Bourke Street Mall in Melbourne last Friday.

The street is off-limits to cars, but there are no bollards preventing vehicles from entering the area, and the prime minister said more needed to be done to prevent such unnecessary attacks from happening in the future. “This is a very, very concerning vulnerability,” Turnbull told Macquarie Radio on Friday. “We need to be able to ensure — as much as we can — that it is not possible to get a vehicle into that place.”—Xinhua

Merkel expected to speak with Trump about Russia on Saturday — source

BERLIN — German Chancellor Angela Merkel is likely to speak with US President Donald Trump on Saturday and the conversation is expected to focus on Russia, a source familiar with the matter told Reuters on Friday.

The source did not say whether Trump might want to speak with Merkel about a lifting of the US sanctions imposed on Russia in response to its intervention in Ukraine, as overnight reports from the United States suggested. But the source made clear that if such a step were taken, then the European Union would not necessarily follow Washington, as its sanctions remain tied to implementation of the Minsk peace deal.—Reuters

Saudi female border guards in Germany for search, confiscation training

RIYADH — German police have launched training for 16 Saudi female border guards on search and confiscation, Al Sharq Al Awsat newspaper reported on Friday.

The training is part of a security agreement signed by the interior ministries of both countries. The Saudi General Directorate of Border Guard has highlighted that the participants are learning new security skills, such as arrest, search, transport of detainees and confiscation.

They are among 60 women who are distributed among Saudi borders to deal with female travelers or suspects. The conservative state doesn’t allow men to deal with female suspects or arrestees.

The announcement of the training came after news reports published last week confirmed that terrorists have been exploiting the attitudes of Saudi society towards women in carrying out their terrorist acts.—Xinhua

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump’s push to create safe zones in Syria could force him to make some risky decisions about how to protect refugees, including showing down Syrian or Russian aircraft or committing thousands of US troops, experts said.

Trump said on Wednesday he “will absolutely do safe zones in Syria” for refugees fleeing violence. According to a document seen by the AP, he is expected in the coming days to order the Pentagon and the State Department to draft a plan to create such zones in Syria and nearby nations.

The document did not spell out what would make a safe zone “safe” and whether it would protect refugees only from threats on the ground — such as jihadist fighters — or whether Trump envisions a no-fly zone policed by America and its allies.

If it is a no-fly zone, without negotiating some agreement with Russia Trump would have to decide whether to give the US military the authority to shoot down Syrian or Russian aircraft if they posed a threat to people in that zone, which his predecessor, former President Barack Obama, refused to do.

“This essentially boils down to a willingness to go to war to protect refugees,” said Jim Phillips, a Middle East expert at the Heritage Foundation think-tank in Washington, noting Russia’s advanced air defences.

Trump promised during his campaign to target jihadists from Islamic State, and he has sought to avoid being dragged deeper into Syria’s conflict — raising the question of whether he might be satisfied by assurances, perhaps from Moscow, that neither Russian nor Syrian jets would target the zone.

A Moscow, Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov said Trump did not consult with Russia and warned that the consequences of such a plan “ought to be weighed up.”

“It is important that this (the plan) does not exacerbate the situation with refugees,” he said. Phillips and other experts, including former US officials, said many refugees would not be satisfied by assurances from Moscow, while any deal with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, who also is backed by Iran, might not go over well with America’s Arab allies.

The Pentagon declined comment on Trump’s remarks, saying no formal directive to develop such plans had been handed down yet, and some US military officials appeared unaware of the document before seeing it described in the media on Wednesday.

“Our department right now is tasked with one thing in Syria, and that is to degrade and defeat ISIS,” said Captain Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman.

Trump’s call for a plan for safe zones is part of a larger directive expected to be signed in coming days that includes a temporary ban on most refugees to the United States and a suspension of visas for citizens of Syria and six other Muslim, Eastern and African countries deemed to pose a terrorism threat.

During and after the presidential campaign, Trump called for no-fly zones to harbour Syrian refugees as an alternative to allowing them into the United States. Trump accused the Obama administration of failing to screen Syrian immigrants entering the United States to ensure they had no militant ties. Any safe zone in Syria guaranteed by the United States would almost certainly require some degree of US military protection. Securing the ground alone would require thousands of troops, former US officials and experts said.

Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Centre for Strategic and International Studies think tank, cautioned that a safe zone inside Syria could become a diplomatic albatross and that it would force a Trump administration to juggle a host of ethnic and political tensions in Syria indefinitely.

Other experts said jihadists could be attracted to the zone, either to carry out attacks that would embarrass the United States or to use the zone as a safe haven where militiamen could gather.

Such a zone also would be expensive, given the need to house, feed, educate and provide medical care to refugees.

“I think these people really have no idea what it takes to support 25,000 people, which is really a small number, in terms of the (internally displaced) and refugees” in Syria, Cordesman said.

The draft document gave no details on what would constitute a safe zone, where one might be set up and who would defend it. Jordan, Turkey and other neighboring countries already host millions of refugees. The Turkish government pressed Obama, without success, to create a no-fly zone on Syria’s border with Turkey but now is at odds with Washington after President Recep Tayyip Erdogan said US Kurdish fighters in Syria — Reuters.

Afghan troops kill two militants during operation

KABUL — Two Taliban militants were killed and four others wounded during an ongoing operation conducted by Afghan security forces in southern province of Uruzgan, the Defense Ministry said on Friday.

“A joint cleanup operation supported by Afghan army’s artillery and air force is continuing in Charchino district, Uruzgan province. Two armed militants were killed and four others injured during the ongoing operation on Thursday,” the ministry said in a statement.

An Afghan army, police and intelligence agency personnel have been involved in the raid which will continue before the district is cleared of the militants, it said.

The province has been the scene of heavy clashes between security forces and Taliban over the past several months. The Taliban has been on rampage since the beginning of 2015 when the Afghan security forces assumed the full responsibility of security from the US and NATO forces.

Syria’s one-million-tonne Russian wheat deal in jeopardy

ABU DHABI/MOSCOW — A deal struck in October for Syria to buy one million tonnes of wheat from its ally Russia to prevent bread shortages in government-held areas has not been fulfilled and may never be, Syrian and Russian government sources said.

A Syrian government official with knowledge of the deal said a final contract had still not been agreed and blamed bureaucratic delays, but added that there were no shortages.

An official at Russia’s agriculture ministry said the core problem was that the little-known firm that won the tender lacked experience and set the price too low.

Syrian state buyer Hoboob set three separate tenders to buy an unprecedented 1.35 million tonnes of wheat last year, after continued fighting from the country’s nearly six-year war and poor rainfall halved the nation’s harvest to 1.3 million tonnes, the lowest in 27 years.

The last of the three tenders was specifically for wheat from Russia, which supports President Bashar al-Assad’s government in the war and from whom Syria often buys its wheat.

Although foodstuffs are not restricted, banking sanctions and an asset freeze on Russian officials in the United Kingdom and Brussels have made it difficult for some trading houses to do business with Assad’s government. Trade with Russia poses long-lasting implications for Syria’s relationship with Russia.

Andrey Sizov, the head of SovEcon agriculture consultancy, said the problems with the deal were unlikely to have serious implications for Syria’s relations with Russia.

“The military and political cooperation is far more important than wheat supplies. Plus, Russia does not say that it would not supply anything, it is just the matter of difficult logistics,” Sizov said.

From the first two tenders, 350,000 tonnes have been delivered and an additional 50,000 tonnes has been shipped, the Syrian government official told Reuters.

Those numbers could not be corroborated by Russian customs data, however. Russia supplied a total of 48,300 tonnes of wheat in Syria in calendar 2016, a source familiar with Russian export data told Reuters.

Russia also plans to give Syria 100,000 tonnes of wheat in humanitarian aid in four cargoes, the Russian agriculture ministry source said.

Sitting less linked to lower risk of diabetes

LONDON — People who spend time walking or even just standing instead of sitting down may be at lower risk of diabetes, a U.K. study suggests.

Previous research has linked sedentary time to type 2 diabetes, which is tied to aging and obesity and happens when the body can’t properly use insulin to convert blood sugar into energy.

For the current study, researchers asked 435 adults at risk for developing diabetes to wear activity monitors around the clock for one week to see how much time they spent sitting, standing and walking. Then they lab tested to see how well their bodies processed sugar and insulin.

Findings from this study “provide further encouraging evidence” that simply substituting sitting for standing throughout the day may improve markers of type 2 diabetes, said study co-author Dr. Joseph Henson, a diabetes researcher at the University of Leicester.

“However, stronger associations were observed for standing, thus highlighting the continued importance of more intense physical activity,” Henson said by email.

Study participants were 67 years old on average. Most of them had excess fat around the midsection and were either overweight or obese, and about one third had a family history of diabetes.

Each day, participants spent an average of 9.4 hours sitting or lying down during their waking hours. This included a total of about 4.2 hours of brief periods of sitting for no more than a half hour, as well as 5.4 hours of prolonged bouts of sitting that lasted at least 30 minutes. In addition, participants typically spent an average of 4.5 hours a day sitting and 1.7 hours a day walking.

People who replaced 30 minutes of prolonged sitting time with shorter bouts of sitting had a 4 percent reduction in fasting insulin levels, researchers calculated.

If participants replaced prolonged sitting with standing, however, they had 5 percent drop in fasting insulin levels, and walking instead was associated with an 11 percent reduction, researchers report in BMJ Open.

The study didn’t find an association between blood sugar or insulin levels when people swapped short periods of sitting for standing, however. Stepping instead of sitting for short periods was linked to a 7 percent drop in fasting insulin levels. The study wasn’t a controlled experiment and can’t prove how different activity levels directly influence the risk of diabetes, the authors note. Researchers also used statistical models to estimate how much changes in activity might impact blood sugar and insulin.

British spaceman Peake to make second journey to International Space Station

LONDON — British spaceman Tim Peake is to make a second flight to the International Space Station, government Business Secretary Greg Clark announced Thursday.

The announcement was made at the opening of an exhibition at the Science Museum in London showcasing Tim Peake’s Soyuz Capsule, which took him to and from the International Space Station last year.

The exhibition is part of a push to inspire young people to study science, technology, engineering and maths careers requiring those skills.

Major Peake was the first British astronaut at European Space Agency, undertaking a 166-day mission to the International Space Station, landing back on the Earth on 18 June, 2016.

Clark said Peake’s new journey into space will advance scientific research and broaden Britain’s understanding of the space environment.

The Department for Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy, said the mission marks a further boost to Britain’s space ambitions and to the profile of a sector of growing economic and educational importance to the country.

“A crucial part of Tim Peake’s work is driving interest in science, technology, engineering and maths in schools, and the UK’s future technical expertise,” said a department spokesman.

Clark also announced that Britain’s space businesses are set to benefit from a 152 million pound (192 million U.S. dollars) fund, using British expertise in satellite technology for international projects monitoring and addressing problems such as flooding, drought and deforestation.

He said companies from Edinburgh, Oxfordshire, and Wales are among those who will use technology such as satellite communications and earth observation data to help address significant social and environmental issues including crop loss, illegal fishing and emergency response. —Xinhua
Gambians celebrate new president’s arrival after veteran ruler flees

BANJUL — Thousands of people lined the streets of Gambia’s capital Banjul on Thursday to welcome home new President Adama Barrow days after authoritarian leader Yahya Jammeh fled into exile under pressure from regional forces.

Barrow, a former real estate agent, won a 1 December election but Jammeh refused to step down, forcing his opponent to be inaugurated at the Gambian Embassy in neighbouring Senegal.

Clad in a long white Afican tunic, Barrow smiled as he stepped out of a small plane and walked down a red carpet to greet hundreds of diplomats and officials lined up to greet him. Immediately afterwards, fighter jets from the West African ECOWAS regional force passed overhead.

“ar new page in Gambian history is being turned,” said Mohamed Ibn Chambas, U.N. Special Representative for West Africa and the Sahel, who helped negotiate Jammeh’s exit, shortly before accompanying Barrow to Banjul.

Barrow’s surprise ballot box victory set the stage for a foreign intervention in Western and African countries to uphold it being celebrated as a moment of democratic hope for Africa.

Yet, diplomats say tiny Gambia was an easy target and that regional armies are unlikely to venture into bigger countries to oust authoritarian rulers with more powerful allies than Jammeh.

Regional leaders helped thrash out a deal last Saturday for Jammeh to fly to exile in Equatorial Guinea as thousands of ECOWAS troops closed in after 22 years of increasingly repressive rule in Gambia, marked by alleged torture and killings of opponents.

Jammeh’s political demise is a relief to many including the small, sliver-like West African country and the UN’s Chambas promised assistance in investigating human rights abuses.

Swiss police detained long-time former Gambian interior minister Ousman Sonko near the Swiss capital of Berne on Thursday, accusing him of filing against him by non-governmental organisation Trial International.

In the weeks following Jammeh’s decision to reject the election outcome in early December, Barrow was seen as vulnerable and was protected by unarmed volunteers until he relocated to Dakar.

During his absence, he was unable to return home for his son’s funeral after a dog attack.

He has asked the 7,000-strong West African military contingent to remain in Gambia for another six months, Chambas said on Thursday.

An ECOWAS official said they were studying the proposal. Gambia, Barry river town surrounded by Western ally Senegal on three sides, has a调动ed army for its size but so far there have been no signs of resistance to ECOWAS.

However, lingering questions remain as to the loyalty of the Republic Guard, thought foreign media squads known in Gambia as the “Junglers” were not known.

Tokyo — The number of foreign workers in Japan topped 1 million for the first time, the labor ministry said Friday, underscoring the increasing reliance on foreigners to make up for labor shortages amid Japan’s declining population.

A record 1,083,769 foreigner workers were working in the country at the end of October, up 19.4 per cent from a year earlier, according to the Ministry of Health, Labor and Welfare.

The figure was the highest since 2008, when the government began requiring companies to register foreign employees.

By nationality, the number of Chinese workers increased 6.9 per cent from the year before to 344,658, accounting for 31.8 per cent of the total, followed by Vietnamese, up 5.6 per cent to 172,018, and accounting for 15.9 per cent.

Filipinos ranked third at 127,518, up 19.7 per cent and making up 11.8 per cent of the total.

The number of foreign workers classified by visas as professors, artists, corporate executives, technical interns and students increased more than 20 per cent, according to the ministry.

The ministry attributed the increase to the government’s efforts to attract overseas talent and help foreign students land jobs amid labor shortages.

According to the ministry, 30.7 per cent of the foreign workers in the country were in Tokyo, with 10.2 per cent in Aichi Prefecture in central Japan, 5.5 per cent in Kanagawa Prefecture bordering Tokyo, 5.4 per cent in Osaka in western Japan and 4.3 per cent in Shizuoka Prefecture just west of Kanagawa.

Beijing smog inspectors on frontlines of war on pollution

BEIJING — Tougher law enforcement has reduced the number of environmental offenders in Beijing in recent years, but more companies need to adapt to the emissions standards in China’s capital, its environmental inspection squad says.

Beijing has been on the frontlines of a “war against pollution” declared by Premier Li Keqiang in 2014, as part of a central government promise to reverse damage done by decades of growth, and strengthen powers to shut down and punish polluters.

With more than 500 environmental inspectors working to identify offenders, thousands of companies have been investigated and punished in the past four years.

But beyond simply enforcing standards, the squad faces the critical task of persuading more firms of the value of protecting the environment, said Wang Yankui, the chief of Beijing’s central environmental inspection squad.

“The difficulty we face now is how to influence more companies to actively make improvements for the sake of environmental protection,” Wang added. “Some companies have this intention, but they don’t know how to do it.”

Besides dealing with violators, the inspectors also keep tabs on “model” companies that have already adopted city standards.

The squad runs a hotline for city residents to report potential polluters, who could eventually join its network of identified offenders.

“If we don’t obey the rules, then we might be penalized, or shut down,” said Li Quan, an official of a car finishing factory on the outskirts of Beijing, which has managed to keep pace with changing environmental standards for several years.

“As a business, survival needs profits, and profits are made under the pre-condition that we abide by the provisions or requirements of the government.”

Cars, not industries, are Beijing’s primary polluters, the national environmental protection bureau said this month, blaming vehicles for more than 31 per cent of harmful emissions.

Authorities have responded by clamping down on the number of vehicles on the road when smog alerts are issued.

But most of the smog originates from polluting industries in surrounding provinces that must be convinced of the need to obey the law, said Greenpeace campaigner Dong Liansai.

“If we only rely on the basic law enforcement authorities and polluting companies to play some sort of cat-and-mouse game, then there may be no way of solving the current pollution problems,” he added.

While many of Beijing’s polluting industries have moved to other provinces, Wang said local authorities have jurisdiction and enforcement is up to them.

Some Beijing residents fear the government’s environmental policies will fail if they ignore polluters in surrounding areas.

“I think (Beijing’s) current policies are to treat the symptoms but not the cause,” said Zhou Gesun, a technician working in the information technology industry.

There is only minor payoff from efforts such as odd and even license-number curbs on vehicle use, and halting work on construction sites, he added.

“The big factors are the areas surrounding Beijing, for instance, heavy industrial factories in Hebei. I think they should bring these factories under their control.”

Besides the squads, Beijing will set up a police force to specifically target environmental offences and polluting activities including open-air barbecues and garbage and biomass burning, the capital’s acting mayor, Cai Qi, said this month.—Reuters

German population hits record high of 82.8 million due to migrants

BERLIN — Germany’s population grew by some 600,000 last year to reach a record high of 82.8 million people due to the number of migrants who have arrived in the country, the Federal Statistics office said on Friday.

In a preliminary estimate for 2016, the statistics office said the population had eclipsed the previous record high of 82.5 million recorded at the end of 2002, even though the number of deaths in 2016 exceeded the number of births by between 150,000 and 190,000.

Deaths have exceed births in Germany since 1972, with a total of more than 5 million fewer births than deaths.

However, countering that trend, more than a million people fleeing war and poverty in the Middle East, Africa and beyond flocked to Germany in 2016, drawn by its strong economy, relatively liberal asylum laws and generous system of benefits.

Since the height of the euro zone debt crisis, Germany is also attracting many migrants from other European countries such as Greece and Spain.

The figures used to calculate net migration were based on numbers signing up at registration offices. Asylum seekers are initially housed in reception centres and generally only registered later.—Reuters

Iranian actress to shun Oscars in protest of Trump immigrant ban

NEW YORK — The star of Iran’s Oscar-nominated movie “The Salesman” said on Thursday she would not attend the Academy Awards ceremony in Hollywood next month because of US President Donald Trump’s proposed ban on immigrants from Muslim nations.

Taranegh Alidoosti, 33, a Tehran-born actress, said the move was racist.

“Trump’s visa ban for Iranians is racist. Whether this will include a cultural event or not, I won’t attend the #AcademyAwards 2017 in protest,” Alidoosti said on Twitter.

An executive order expected to be signed by Trump in coming days will block the entry to the United States of Iranian refugees, and suspend the entry of any immigrants from Muslim-majority countries Syria, Sudan, Somalia, Iraq, Iran, Libya and Yemen.

In “The Salesman,” Alidoosti plays one half of an Iranian couple whose life becomes strained as they take part in a production of the American stage classic “Death of a Salesman.”

The film, by Iranian director Asghar Farhadi, was nominated on Tuesday for a foreign-language Oscar, and has won prizes at film festivals in Cannes, Chicago and Munich.

Alidoosti has also appeared in the popular Iranian TV soap opera “Shahrazad.” — Reuters

Pay attention 007! Gadget whizz ‘Q’ is a woman in real life

LONDON — The boffin behind James Bond’s lethal array of gadgets like car ejector-seats and exploding toothpaste — known only as “Q” — has always been portrayed in the 007 films as a man.

Actors who have played him include Desmond Llewellyn, Geoffrey Bayldon and John Cleese.

But in real life Q is actually a woman, the chief of Britain’s MI6 intelligence service has revealed.

Speaking at the Women in IT Awards in London, Alex Younger invited his audience to consider a job with the service.

“If any of you would like to join us … the real-life Q is looking forward to meeting you and I’m pleased to report that the real-life Q is a woman,” he said.

The agency’s chief, who has previously said he wouldn’t hire James Bond as a spy, also felt the film stereotype of spies being posh and educated at elite universities was unhelpful.

“That stands in the way of something that I regard as being so important which is that we can reach into every community in Britain and make sure that we get the people that are the best, regardless of their background,” Younger said.

Actor Shia LaBeouf arrested in New York anti-Trump protest

NEW YORK — Actor Shia LaBeouf was arrested early on Thursday after a scuffle outside a New York museum where he was chanting “He will not divide us” during a live-streamed protest against President Donald Trump, police said.

The “Transformers” and “American Honey” star allegedly pulled a 25-year-old man’s scarf, scratched his face and kicked him at about 12:30 am EST outside the Museum of the Moving Image in the borough of Queens, a police spokesman said. The cause of the altercation was unknown.

The 30-year-old actor was chanting “He will not divide us” during a live-streamed protest against President Donald Trump, police said.

LaBeouf and two other artists began the protest on 20 January, the day that Trump, a Republican, was inaugurated as the 45th president of the United States. They have invited the public to repeat the words into the camera nonstop for the next four years in a “participatory performance,” according to their website. — Reuters
South African artist shapes salt into famous faces

PRETORIA — South African artist Percy Maimela stumbled upon his talent by chance, when some salt crystals spilled on the floor of the shop where he worked and as he tried to collect them he realized they formed shapes that he now turns into portraits.

His latest inspiration is former US President Barack Obama. “You can just take small stones and make something that no one ever thought of,” he told Reuters in the capital Pretoria.

“Even salt companies, they wouldn’t say salt is just for food anymore,” he said, crouching over his portrait of Obama on his dining room floor.

The 31-year-old applies glue to cloth and then sprinkles table salt to shape the portrait. Some of the famous faces he has drawn include global icon Nelson Mandela. Often, he’ll chance his luck with passersby.

“I’ll just carry just a black cloth and a bag of salt, then you can just come and give me 300 rand ($23) and then I’ll just sketch your face, quick,” he said. “And for you it’s a memory and you’ll never get that anywhere else.”

Maimela — who quit his job at a retail store last year to pursue his craft — said he has loved art since he was a child but could never afford professional training.

Getting started on a commissioned piece of work requires a tiny investment of less than 50 US cents for salt and a little extra for glue. He said he can sell a piece for about $30.

Maimela, who also works in pencil, has not been able to get any of his work shown in galleries and relies on the Internet to generate interest in his work.

“Being an artist in total is not easy, because not everyone understand art and then not everyone is willing to buy art. But everyone is willing to buy something that’s provoking to their feelings,” Maimela said.—Reuters

Young girl who tweeted from Aleppo asks Trump to help Syrian children

LONDON — The seven-year-old Syrian girl who gained a global following last year with her Twitter updates from Aleppo has written an open letter to US President Donald Trump asking him to help other children her war-torn country.

Bana Alabed drew some 365,000 followers after she joined the micro-blogging site in September where she uploaded messages and pictures of daily life in Aleppo on the @AlabedBana handle, an account managed by her mother Fatemah.

Last month, the young girl and her family were evacuated from the rebel-held eastern part of the city following a government offensive. They arrived in Turkey, where they met President Tayyip Erdogan.

Turkey has supported rebels fighting Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. On her own @Fatema-hAlabed Twitter account, Fatemah posted a picture of the handwritten letter where the young girl introduces herself to Trump as “part of the Syrian children who suffered from the Syrian war”.

“…Can you please save the children and people of Syria? You must do something for the children of Syria because they are like your children and deserve peace like you,” the letter reads. “If you promise me you will do something for the children of Syria, I am already your new friend. Britain’s BBC quoted Fatemah as saying Bana penned the letter before Trump’s inauguration last Friday. In the letter, Bana also talks about losing friends in the nearly-six-year conflict and her new life outside Syria.—Reuters

United edge past spirited Hull to reach League Cup final

LONDON — Manchester United reached the League Cup final but were made to sweat as Hull City won the second leg of their last-four encounter 2-1 on Thursday to come within one goal of forcing extra time.

Hull’s Oumar Niasse scored in the 85th minute to reduce the aggregate deficit to 3-2, but there was to be no fairytale comeback for the Premier League relegation strugglers who were spirited in their efforts to overturn their 2-0 first-leg defeat.

Tom Huddlestone had put the hosts ahead after 35 minutes from the penalty spot, but they were unable to turn the screw and allowed a much-improved United to claw their way back into the match after the break when Paul Pogba stabbed in an equaliser.

Niasse steered home a David Meyler cross from close range but José Mourinho’s side held on to set up a clash against Southampton in the final at Wembley on Feb. 26 after the Saints upset Liverpool on Wednesday at Anfield.

It was Mourinho’s 54th birthday, but the Portuguese did not seem in celebratory mood as he short-shifted his post-match television interview after one question, having seemed visibly annoyed on the touchline with a number of referee Jon Moss’s decisions.

“I just want to say congratulations to my players. It was a difficult road to be in the final and we are in the final,” Mourinho told Sky Sports after his side’s 17-game unbeaten run came to an end.

“I don’t want to say anything else. It is enough. I am calm, I haven’t said so much,” added the Portuguese, who has been given two two-game bans this season.

Niall faced a daunting prospect to drag themselves back into the tie and made seven changes to their starting lineup in a sign that manager Marco Silva had perhaps already decided a Wembley final was beyond them.

The encounter had the feel of a foregone conclusion too as both sets of players seemed to be going through the motions in a damp opening when neither side created a chance before the deadlock was broken after 35 minutes following a penalty decision that caused initial confusion.

Replays showed that United defender Marcos Rojo had barely tugged the shirt of Hull’s Harry Maguire, who tumbled to the ground before Huddlestone rifled the spot kick into the bottom corner.

It was not until the second half that United showed true signs of life and they had their own penalty appeal waved away when Chris Smalling tumbled to the ground after contact with Huddlestone, sparking an angry touchline reaction from Mourinho.

Tiger struggles at Torrey Pines, Rose sets pace

Tiger Woods produced the good, the bad and the ugly in his first PGA Tour start in 17 months on Thursday while Olympic champion Justin Rose set the early pace in the opening round of the Farmers Insurance Open.

Back in the familiar surroundings of Torrey Pines outside San Diego where he has won eight tournaments as a professional, Woods scrambled well on his front nine and made two early birdies after the turn before badly losing steam on the way to a four-over 76 on the South Course.

Woods eagled two of the four par-fives on the easier North layout to move one ahead of the field with a sparkling seven-under 65. Woods dropped six shots in six holes from the 12th to end the day 11 strokes off the pace.

It was the 41-year-old’s highest opening round to begin a PGA Tour season since he turned professional in 1996.

“I was one under through 11 and I was in a good spot to really shoot a good round … but it went the other way,” Woods told Golf Channel. “I hit some bad tee shots, made a bad three-putt there on 13 … just kept compounding problems and mistakes out there.”

Watched by huge galleries, Woods made a faltering start with an opening bogey after settling in off the company of world number one Jason Day and third-ranked Dustin Johnson.

After finding the right rough off the tee at the par-four first, he missed the green to the right with his approach and failed to get up and down in two.

Though he fired several iron shots to the right on the outward nine, Woods used his renowned scrambling abilities to save pars from several unpromising positions to reach the turn in one-over 37.

He gave fans something to celebrate with birdies at the 10th and 11th but his round unravelled over the next four holes. Wayward tee shots led to bogeys at the 12th, 13th and 14th and Woods ran up a double at the 15th after hooking his drive into the trees.

He missed a five-foot putt to bogey the par-four 17th before signing off with a nine-footer to birdie the last.

MELBOURNE — Rafa Nadal fended off Grigor Dimitrov 6-3, 5-7, 7-6(5), 6-7(4), 6-4 in a marathon semi-final on Friday to set up a dream Australian Open decider against great rival Roger Federer.

Nadal was under siege from the dogged Bulgarian for much of the nerve-shredding clash at Rod Laver Arena, but the Spaniard crashed through Dimitrov’s defences in the final set to book his first grand slam final since his 2014 French Open title.

With tension reaching boilingle-point and the terraces roaring, Nadal captured the decisive break in the ninth game and closed out victory on his third match point when Dimitrov hammered a backhand long.

Nadal and Federer will meet in their ninth grand slam final and first at Melbourne Park since the Spaniard won the 2009 title. —Reuters
