South East Asia analyst, Mr. Lusty Jagath, said that the conflict in the region had been exacerbated by the lack of regional cooperation and a failure to address the root causes of the problem.

According to Jagath, the conflict had been fueled by a combination of historical grievances, territorial disputes, and disputes over natural resources. He pointed out that the governments in the region had been too focused on their own interests and had neglected to address the needs of the people.

Jagath also noted that the conflict had been further compounded by the influence of external powers, who had been using the region for their own strategic purposes.

He called for a more collaborative approach to resolving the conflict, emphasizing the need for regional cooperation and a focus on addressing the root causes of the problem.

The United Nations has expressed its concern over the situation in the region and has called for a peaceful resolution to the conflict. The UN has also been working to increase awareness of the issue and to encourage dialogue between the parties involved.

Meanwhile, the international community has been providing assistance to those affected by the conflict, with many countries offering financial aid and other forms of support.

While progress has been slow, there are signs of hope for a peaceful resolution to the conflict. Many people in the region have been calling for a end to the violence and for a more just and equitable future.

In conclusion, while the conflict in the region remains challenging, there is hope that with continued efforts and a commitment to peace, a resolution can be achieved.
