National League for Democracy...Bulletin 13/90...includes:... 'When will power be transferred? When will Daw Aung San Suu Kyi be released? The problem of three powers. The problem of political prisoners. The Chinese Ambassador says the National League for Democracy and the SLORC really need to hold discussions.'... One really had to scour right through the paper to find out the name of the publisher.... If false stuff is written and if accusations are made, we will have to call the publisher in and tell him.... We have called him [U Chit Khaing] in and told him that action will be taken according to law if it went on any further. So [he] has furnished this signed statement of undertaking that a correction will be inserted.... [photocopy of hand-written statement]." [Earlier errors in NLD publications, implying that Gen. Saw Maung had personally given press conferences, outlined at length.]

.....-- Lengthy discussion of foreign diplomatic meddling. Why does the NLD mention only the Chinese Ambassador when it has met with many Western Ambassadors? "No foreigner will love our country.... They have made all kinds of rules to be observed by [our] diplomats and even when we want to have our embassy building repaired it is not easy. One cannot fell a tree freely. That is in their country.... Our embassy staff...have no freedom of their movements. This is according to their Ministry of Foreign Affairs We do not pay attention to their pressure on us....we do not pay the slightest attention to their pressure." (WPD 7/14)

The principal points from the Special Envoy's speech [text of summary from NLM; full text not published in NLM] were:

- China and Myanmar are two friendly neighbours that exist with their forests, mountains, water and land contiguous. Since ancient times the peoples of the two countries have maintained friendly interchanges and traditional baobo friendship [presumably the Chinese equivalent of the Burmese term paukphaw--"cousin"--traditionally used to describe the Sino-Burmese special relationship. HCMacD.].

- What is to be specially pointed out is that the two countries had together led in proposing the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence and achieved full success in resolutions of the matter of boundary demarcation, and so had set an example of amicable and friendly co-existence with mutual confidence and reliance.

- Different changes centered on establishment of socialist market economic system have deepened continuously and made new gains. At the same time, the Government and the people of China are very much delighted to see the Government and the people of the Union of Myanmar achieving successes in their nation-building tasks.

- Neighbourly friendship, and perpetuation and development of bilateral relations between China and Myanmar is the consistent policy of the Chinese Government.

- We are confident that, through mutual efforts, friendship and cooperation between China and Myanmar would produce more fruitful results.

Principal points from the speech of Deputy Prime Minister Vice-Adm. Maung Maung Khin [text of NLM summary]:

- The river that is our friendship stems from the streams of shared tradition, geography and the sense of closeness and co-operation we have in social and cultural matters.

- I am sure the leaders of both countries will share the view that both countries have a close identity in regional and international forums, with a mutual reciprocity in the process of development, and with common values and concerns.

- The Myanmar people have always considered our Chinese friends as kith and kin with the genuine interest of consolidating the shared values. It is therefore my privilege to extend our hospitality to you on this happy and auspicious occasion.

Sept. 21: International Airport at Mandalay Midway Between East and West, by Sein Shwe Hlaing. [There has been news in the past few weeks of another major SLORC project, "that of constructing an international airport in Mandalay...." Brig-Gen. Kyaw Than of Central Command visited the site and met with Mr. Luo Kaifu, Chairman of the CMC Beijing of China, "whose organization is going to collaborate with Myanmar in the building of the airport." The following are facts on the project. "The Mandalay International Airport (Tada-U), is located at longitude 96 East and latitude 21°40' North which is a place 12 miles south of Tada-U town, 8 miles west of Singaing town that is on Yangon-Mandalay highway, 2 miles north of Kyaukse-Nahtogyi motor road and about 2000 feet east of Tada-U-Umin village motor road, on a hard-surface ridge 33,000 feet in length and 2,500 feet in breadth." The elevation is 305 feet above sealevel. "Under arrangements made by the Commander of the Central Command 15,000 local people are now contributing voluntary labour in improving the existing Singaing-Sawye road into a motorable one. Travel time from the airport to Mandalay will be further shortened when a Bailey bridge has been built across the Panlaung river." Land survey and designing has been completed, and structural construction begun. "Myanmar is collaborating with China in implementation of this project. Collaborating agencies from China are the CMC (China National Machinery Import and Export Corporation) and the YMC (Yunnan Machinery Import and Export Corporation). The main runway will be constructed by Myanmar, the International Terminal buildings and all other facilities will be built by the Chinese. Management of the whole project will be by Commander of Central Command and financing by the Civil Aviation Department...." The project is due for completion in 18 months. The airport will have a runway of 14,000 feet, and all facilities will be to international standards. "About 70 international aircraft overfly the territory of Myanmar every day at present. Aircraft that flies across Myanmar air space has to pay a fee of a minimum 192 dollars. If 50 aircraft fly across Myanmar airspace a day fees obtained from them for a month would come to 288,000 dollars or three and a half million dollars a year or 70 million dollars in 20 years." The new airport will be able to take Boeing 747-400 aircraft and larger. It will "become an international airport for Upper Myanmar and have a longer runway than the Lower Myanmar international airport at Mingaladon which has a runway of 8,100 feet.... {It} will provide the shortest route for air transport between the Eastern world and the Western world" Tourists will surely come. {maps}]

"I am very pleased to pay an official goodwill visit to the Union of Myanmar at the kind invitation of Senior General Than Shwe, Chairman of the State Law and Order Restoration Council and Prime Minister. I would like to extend, on behalf of the Chinese Government and people, our high regards and good wishes to the Government and people of Myanmar.

"China and Myanmar are close neighbours linked by mountains and rivers and our two peoples have enjoyed a traditional phaukphaw friendship. Recent years have witnessed a steady growth of the friendly relations between China and Myanmar based on the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence and good cooperation between the two sides in the political, economic, cultural and other fields. History over the past four decades and more proves that friendship between China and Myanmar is in keeping with the fundamental interests and shared aspiration of our two peoples, and is conducive to peace and stability of this region. My current visit is aimed at further strengthening the good neighbourly and friendly ties between us and expanding our mutually beneficial cooperation. I will exchange views with leaders of Myanmar on bilateral relations and regional and international issues of common concern. I believe that as the Myanmar side has made thoughtful arrangements, my current visit will yield positive results and further facilitate the growth of the existing friendly relations between our two countries both in scope and depth.

"May the Union of Myanmar enjoy prosperity and its people well-being!"

In the late afternoon, SLORC Secretary-1 Lt-Gen. Khin Nyunt and [his wife] Dr. Khin Win Shwe called on the Premier.

In the evening, Senior General Than Shwe hosted a banquet for the visiting Chinese Premier, at which speeches were exchanged [full texts printed in NLM].

That of Senior General Than Shwe concluded, after reviewing previous Chinese visits, "I am therefore convinced that your visit, even though very brief, will be registered as a welcoming new chapter in the annals of our Pauk Phaw relations. It is therefore my conviction that we shall have a stronger and active cooperation in the years ahead." He also thanked China for permitting the 45-day tour of Myanmar, beginning last April, of the Sacred Tooth of Lord Buddha.

Chinese Premier Li Peng returned the remarks with a toast, in which, after noting the 40th anniversary of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, he said: "The world today is still in transition from an old pattern to a new one, the trend toward multipolarity is accelerating, the international situation is complicated and volatile, hegemonism and power politics are still in existence, the world economic development remains uneven and North-South gap continues widening. Peace and development remain the two major tasks facing the world. China stands ready to join hands with other Asian countries, including Myanmar in holding high the banner of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence and work together to establish a fair and equitable new international political and economic order, and bring a more peaceful, stable, prosperous and developed Asia into the 21st century." Senior General Than Shwe "made it clear that the problem would be solved through development projects for the hill regions in the north."

After discussing the current international situation, the spokesman said Premier Li Peng said "China opposes the policy practised by other countries in bullying and influencing others and the country will never practice such a policy of bullying and influencing other countries and it will never plan to gain influence over others. As China opposes other countries interfering in the internal affairs of the country it will never interfere in the internal affairs of other countries. The Government and the people of each and every country have the right to choose the social system and development path which are suitable to the prevailing situation of respective country. He said the Premier has mentioned that China has proposed and urged all the time for all to respect the culture, traditions and religious belief of each and every country." Dec. 28: News Conference: Premier Li Peng visited the Shwedagon Pagoda, and later gave a News Conference, saying that "the visit was short but had achieved complete success," details of which would appear in the Joint Communique.

In response to a question from Xinhua News Agency, he reviewed Myanmar-Chinese friendship, and "pointed out that border trade had made considerable progress during the past years. He assured that efforts would be made for further progress.

In response to a question from U Sein Win of Kyodo News Agency about human rights in China and Myanmar, and citing Western commentaries that China's support for Myanmar "is aimed at looking for an outlet to the Indian Ocean," the Premier "replied developing countries have their own views on human rights. The concept of human rights is very extensive. He said China shares the same view on human rights with many Asian countries, actually with many other developing countries. He said he can give the names of those countries that include Myanmar. As to reports of Western news agencies that his visit was aimed at establishing China's military influence on the Indian Ocean, he said it is sheer fabrication.... China...will never engage in any hegemonistic activities and actually it has not stationed a single soldier abroad. He pointed out that as the mediamen could see there was no military personnel in his delegation. So, the delegation had not discussed military matters with Myanmar, he said.

In response to a question from U Maung Maung of Jiji Press, the Premier praised Myanmar's economic development, beauty, and tourist attractions.

In response to a question from Mr. Hirotsugu Tamura, Chief of Asahi Shimbun Singapore Bureau, concerning China's solution to the Tiananmen issue and "the view of the Premier on finding a solution to the problem of Daw Aung San Suu Kyi issue in Myanmar," the Premier "replied that the matter of Daw Aung San Suu Kyi is Myanmar's internal affairs and he would not interfere. He spoke of the difference between China and the West. He said the matter of Daw Aung San Suu Kyi was not discussed in his meetings. He said Myanmar friends told him they would give priority to national reconciliation and wished them success. The Premier said political stability is important and economic progress would be impossible without it. Political stability should be given priority for any task, he said."

In response to questions from the China People's Daily and Kyemon Daily, the Premier spoke generally of economic and trade cooperation between the two countries.

In response to a question from U Hla Htwe of Nikkei and Antara news agencies, noting that there had been expectations of a signed bilateral agreement during the visit, the Premier said the visit "was to enhance mutual understanding and to lay more solid foundation for cooperation in future.... Concerning the signing of bilateral agreement, he said competent officials would sign them at an appropriate time. He said it would not be necessary for such agreements to be signed in the presence of top leaders of the two countries as it was only a matter of formality."

In response to a question from Jing Xiaolin of China News Service about policy towards Chinese resident in Myanmar (with whom the Premier had met), he "replied that Chinese nationals would have to abide by the laws and rules of the host nations. They would have to live in friendship and closely together with the people of those nations. He said he believed Chinese nationals would be able to contribute towards Myanmar's economic development.... He said China has no intention to make capital out of overseas Chinese. He said he also believed overseas Chinese would be able to live in friendship with the people of the nation concerned and contribute towards further promoting friendship between the two countries."

Joint Communique: A lengthy Joint Communique was issued [full text in NLM], listing those present at the meeting between the Premier and the SLORC Chairman. Myanmar informed the Premier of its "far reaching constitutional, political, economic and social changes...and...efforts to secure national reconciliation." Both sides recalled the 40th Anniversary of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, endorsed them, and "believed that the countries of the world should have the right to freely choose their own social system and road of development according to their traditions, culture, historical background and popular aspirations." They "expressed their readiness to work for regional peace, security, stability and economic development." China praised Myanmar's economic development efforts. The two sides "reaffirmed their desire to further promote cooperation in the economic, agricultural, environmental, cultural, tourism, forestry, educational and scientific affairs, as well as in combatting illicit drugs." [Border trade encouraged]

July 19: (35) The State Law and Order Restoration Council has been most methodically implementing the economic reform programme only after giving precedence to the interests of the entire mass of the people. In 1988 Myanmar foreign exchange reserve was meagre. The government had therefore to urge merchants doing export-import business to export first. Barter systems had to be resorted to because of lack of foreign exchange. Efforts had to be made to open cross-border trade.

An agreement on China-Myanmar border trade was signed in October 1988 and cross-border trade began. This trade was carried on at three points--Namhkan, Muse and Pansaing (Kyukok). Myanmar exported cotton, duck feathers, chicken feed, dried fish, dried prawns, betel nuts, dried plums, isinglass, air bladder, green gram, dried chillies, groundnut cakes, soya bean, pomelo, etc. These were commodities that Myanmar had not thought of exporting in the past.

The Chinese exported to Myanmar medicines, construction materials, tooth-paste, thermos flasks, bicycles, soap powder, baby milk, enamel paints, crockery and other personal goods. These had been black market stores controlled in the past by the BCP. When the border trade was opened it became possible to bring in these commodities after paying Customs Duties at the border and sell them freely in any part of the country. This expedited flow of commodities.

Efforts were also made to open similar border trade with Thailand and with Bangladesh. Border trade with Thailand began in sea-fishing sector. Nineteen companies from various foreign countries approached Myanmar for legal fishing rights. In fact fish resources in Myanmar seas were being poached for a very long time. To try to sell those resources that were being stolen would only bring in cash

Dec. 25 [full text]: "Bombs explode while large number of pilgrims pay homage to Sacred Tooth Relic. A bomb exploded in the shadows south of two lion statues at the Kaba Aye Pagoda's eastern stairway at 8.20 pm today, but no one was hurt.

"As the authorities were investigating the explosion, while a large number of pilgrims were paying homage to the Sacred Tooth Relic in the Maha Pasana Cave as it was Christmas Day and Full-moon Day of Nadaw, a second explosion occurred from within a vase at the place where flowers were offered at 10.35 pm.

"Seven security members on duty, one Red Cross member, four Union Solidarity and Development Association members, one member of the Sangha and five pilgrims totalling 18 were injured and one security member, two USDA members and one Red Cross member totalling four were killed.

"The Secretary-1 and the Secretary-2 of the State Law and Order Restoration Council, the Minister for Religious Affairs, responsible personnel and the Ambassador of the People's Republic of China came out there for inspection.

"It is learnt that such explosion was due to planting of a timed mine by the group of dastardly destructive elements with extremely wicked and ruthless intent to harm the friendship between China and Myanmar, disrupt the stability in the country, disturb the Buddhist laity's faith and reverence in the religion, cause terror and anxiety among the people, and that there was no damage whatsoever to the Sacred Tooth Relic." Dec. 27: A spokesman for the Chinese Embassy in Yangon issued the following statement:

"We are shocked at the bomb explosion in the Maha Pasana Cave on the evening of 25th December and strongly condemn this terrorist action. The Chinese Buddha's Tooth Relic came to Myanmar for enshrinement with the request of the Myanmar Government and the desire of the great majority of the Myanmar Buddhists. The bomb attacks on the Sacred Shrine killing and injuring the innocent people blaspheme the Buddha and go against the will of the people." (NLM 12/28)

Dec. 27: Dean of the Diplomatic Corps, Russian Ambassador Mr. Valeri Nazarov sent the following letter to Minister for Foreign Affairs U Ohn Gyaw:

"I was deeply distressed to learn about the unimaginable atrocity committed by dastardly unscrupulous elements at the Kaba Aye Pagoda and in the Maha Pasana Cave on the 25th of December, 1996, amidst a large number of pilgrims paying homage to the Sacred Chinese Buddha's Tooth Relic, resulted in killing four and injuring eighteen innocent people.

"This unprecedentedly cynical act of terrorism can cause nothing but the strongest feelings of shock, indignation and protest. Such a disgusting crime is totally incompatible with fundamental values of any civilized society and must be unconditionally condemned. My staff and, I am sure, my colleagues in the Diplomatic Corps share these sentiments.

"May I ask you to convey our heartfelt sympathy and condolence to the bereaved families and to those injured in the bomb attack." (NLM 12/28)

"Buddhists have known that Devadat tried to kill the Lord Buddha by pushing a boulder onto Him.... Devadat...ended up his life being engulfed by earth.... Let me name the bomb explosion of the heretic destructionists at Maha Pasana Cave on 25-12-96 'Devadat Bomb'. They are Devadats who will be engulfed by earth before dusk."]

Dec. 27: Editorial: Keep vigil against destructive elements. ["It is shocking and outrageous that destructive elements were so brazen and evil as to cause death and injury at such a sacred place as the Maha Pasana Cave, the venue of the Buddha's Sacred Tooth Relic from the People's Republic of China. Their intention for committing such foolish and ruthless acts is quite obvious. It could be concluded that it is designed to harm the friendly relations between China and Myanmar, disrupt the stability in the country and cause terror and anxiety among the people. So, we should be mindful to ensure that it does not turn out to be as hoped for by the destructive elements and internal axe-handles with negative views. We will have to be vigilant to pre-empt recurrence of anything like the loss we have just suffered. It is necessary to act with rational appraisal and control. We must keep our eyes and ears alert and keep vigil with security awareness against the danger of destructive elements' brazen perpetrations and endeavour to expose them before they could strike again...."]

China and Burma have signed an agreement to boost military cooperation, including training and exchange of intelligence, the Far Eastern Economic Review said Wednesday.

General Than Shwe, the chairman of the junta, finalised the accord with Chinese Prime Minister Li Peng a few weeks ago, it said.

"Under the deal, China will train 300 Burmese airforce and navy officers in flying skills, naval duties and the gathering of intelligence in coastal areas, while the People's Liberation Army (PLA) will provide additional places in staff colleges for senior Burmese officers," it said.

The two countries would exchange military intelligence and Beijing could also provide arms shipments to Rangoon at "friendship prices," it said.

Title: BURMA: Lashio-Hsenwi Sector of Highway to China Border Opened

Document Number: FBIS-EAS-97-022

Document Date: 30 Jan 1997

Rangoon Myanmar Alin in Burmese, 30 Jan 97 p4

[Article by Min Thein: "The dawn of a new historical era"]

[FBIS Translated Excerpt] [Passage omitted on lyrics of a song] Our journalist delegation led by Construction Minister Major General Saw Tun arrived at Lashio on 17 January 1997 by Myanmar [Burma] Airways with arrangements made by a local company -- Asia World Company [owned by former drug warlord Lo Hsing Han]. We came to attend the inauguration of the 28-mile-long Lashio-Hsenwi Road -- the first such endeavor undertaken by a local company -- on the morning of 18 January 1997.

In accordance with the Myanmar Investment Commission Permit No. Ma-Na-Ta-035/96 issued on 22 July 1996, the Asia World Company and the Public Works Department of the Construction Ministry signed an agreement on 22 July 1996 to construct the 102-mile-3-furlong-long Lashio-Muse [town bordering China] sector of the Mandalay-Lashio- Muse Union Highway. The 28-mile-long Lashio-Hsewi Road will be opened in the first phase while the 16-mile-long Hsenwi-Kutkai Road, the 27-mile-long Kutkai-Nantphetkar Road, and the 25-mile-long Nantphetkar-Mongyu Road will be opened in the latter part of this year.

After Asia World Company signed the contract it either leased or imported US$4 million worth of heavy machinery, bitumen distributors, water bowsers, agitator trucks, and dump trucks. With its technicians and workers working day and night the company was able to complete the 22-foot-wide 28-mile-long Lashio-Hsenwi Road in three months. It is learnt that the total investment in the Lashio-Muse Road project will be over 800 million Myanmar Kyats and US$27 million.

Furthermore, toll ways, toll offices, control and communication systems, parking areas, entry and exit roads, rest areas, and recreation centers will also be built. Asia World will collect toll fees in accordance with the agreement signed with the Public Works Department; Kyat 100 for a small car under one ton, Kyat 300 for a medium-size car weighing between one and two and three quarter tons, Kyat 500 for a big bus, Kyat 1,000 for a medium-size truck weighing up to 10 tons, Kyat 2,000 for trucks weighing between 10 and 20 tons, and trucks weighing more than 20 tons will pay Kyat 2,000 up to 20 tons and Kyat 200 for every extra ton.

The toll fees will be appropriately determined by the government once all the toll gates are completed. Tax on the tolls collected will be given to the government according to the following yearly rates: For the 10-year period, from the 4th to the 13th year, 10 percent; for the 10-year period from the 14th to the 23d year, 20 percent, for the seven-year period from the 24th to the 30th year, 30 percent.

Once the Mandalay-Lashio-Muse Union Highway is completed, transportation will become much smoother, bolstering regional economic and social growth and leading to a reduction in commodity prices. Moreover, it will further enhance the goodwill and economic cooperation between the peoples of Myanmar and China. [passage omitted]

Instead of the government taking full responsibility, the participation of the public, who directly benefits from such endeavors, to a certain extent for a better and smoother transportation shows "the dawn of a new historical era".

Title: CHINA: Jiang Zemin on 'Foreign Policy of Peace'

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-97-045

Document Date: 1 Mar 1997

Hong Kong ZHONGGUO TONGXUN SHE in Chinese, 1226 GMT 1 Mar 97

Subslug: ["Special Article" by Hong Kong ZTS reporter He Chong (6320 3095): "China's Independent Foreign Policy of Peace Will Remain Unchanged"]

[FBIS Translated Text] Hong Kong, 1 Mar (ZTS) -- Receiving foreign guests recently, China State President Jiang Zemin said: The Chinese party and government will carry out the behest of Deng Xiaoping; uphold the great undertaking of socialist reform, opening up, and modernization initiated by him; and continue to pursue the independent foreign policy of peace in order to contribute toward promoting world peace and development. An article released recently by Beijing to mourn the passing of Deng Xiaoping pointed out: An important part of Deng Xiaoping theory on building socialism with Chinese characteristics deals with the analysis of international situation and policy decisions on China's international strategies. Its most prominent aspects are the readjustment of relations with the United States, Japan, and Russia; development of friendly relations with adjacent countries and third world countries; and opening up of new prospects in foreign relations, all of which help create a favorable peaceful international environment in which we could concentrate on modernization. Deng Xiaoping held that China needs a stable internal environment as well as a peaceful international environment to carry out socialist modernization. He judged the hour, sized up the situation, and came up with a set of foreign strategies. He pointed out: Peace and development are the two main issues in the contemporary world. We should persevere in an independent foreign policy of peace, opposing hegemonism, and upholding world peace. He advocated using the five principles of peaceful coexistence as the criteria for building new international political and economic order. He stressed that China will forever be in the third world and will never seek hegemony. At a special UN meeting as early as 1974 Deng Xiaoping expounded, on the Chinese Government's behalf, "The theory of the three worlds", declaring China's stand against hegemonism and winning cheers from third world countries.

At the end of January 1979, not long after China and the United States established official diplomatic relations, Deng Xiaoping visited the United States and opened a new page in Sino-U.S. economic and trade cooperation as well as opening the door for China to send large batches of students to study abroad in the United States. That was a major strategic foreign policy measure. Deng Xiaoping regarded the opening up as China's basic national policy, and relations between China and the United States, the number one nation in the west, would always be an obstacle toward opening up unless they were good. The U.S. strategy of "encirclement and blockade" against China would lose its morality and justice if China and the United States established a stable relationship that would enable China's opening up to the outside world to play a key role in making a breakthrough at the center.

Deng Xiaoping visited Japan in October 1978, and the Sino-Japanese treaty of peace and friendship was exchanged. The development of Sino-Japanese friendly relations played an equally important role in suppressing the revival of militarism and stabilizing peace in Asia while supporting China's opening up to the outside world. Over the last 25 years, triangular relations between China, U.S., and Japan have been in a state of equilibrium. Sino-Japanese trade volume was the largest in China's foreign trade, and there were more loans from Japan than other countries. This illustrated the importance of maintaining friendly Sino-Japanese relations.

In the early 1980's, Deng Xiaoping strove to improve relationships with the USSR by suggesting that the two sides dispatch envoys for talks. The three largest obstacles to Sino-USSR relations were eventually eliminated following six long years of talks. When USSR President Gorbachev visited China in 1989, Deng Xiaoping said to him: Our meeting serves to end the past and open up the future. Relations between the two countries will be normalized as of today. China maintained normal relations with Russia after the dissolution of the USSR, signed a border treaty, and eliminated the state of confrontation that had persisted for over 20 years so that the peoples living along the 7,000 km-plus border could resume friendly exchanges, and that China would have no fear of disturbance in terms of northern frontier defense.

China's friendly relations with neighboring countries developed gradually, and the country enjoyed close relations with Pakistan, Nepal, Burma, and all ASEAN countries. China improved its relations with Vietnam and India, and established a historically rare peaceful environment for good-neighborly, friendly relations with Korea.

In mid-1980's, Deng Xiaoping made major changes to the national defense strategy on the assumption that a world war would not occur for quite some time. At a time when the United States and USSR, the two super powers, were incessantly arguing with each other in disarmament talks and preparing for the development of "Star War" weapons, Deng Xiaoping announced that China would unilaterally disarm its military force by the millions, and strive for world peace with real actions. He won applause from most countries in the world.

The changeable international situation at the end of 1980's and early 1990's saw the successive dissolution of the USSR and East Europe countries, and a seriously complicated situation occurred in the socialist cause, presenting China with a test. In response to this, Deng Xiaoping put forward the strategy of "coolly observing, securing one's position, dealing with the situation calmly, and accomplishing something." He always gave top priority to safeguarding China's state sovereignty and security, and overcame challenges from all aspects. At the same time, he held fast to the central task of economic construction, and elevated China's economic level.

Influential political figures from all countries felt that after Deng Xiaoping's passing, "post-Deng China" will uphold the reform and opening up policy formulated by him and the line of economic construction as the central task.

In this sense, China will still need a peaceful international environment and will still have to promote good-neighboring friendly relations. It appears that Deng's line of foreign policy will not change.

Title: Study With Burma on Water Transport Route

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-97-063

Document Date: 4 Mar 1997

Beijing Zhongguo Xinwen She in English 1324 GMT 04 Mar 97

Beijing, March 4 (CNS) -- A jointly conducted study has been completed by a Sino-Burmese expert group on the possibility of land and water transport, via Yunnan Province and into the Irrawaddy River valley in Burma. The report concludes that it is feasible to open an outlet into the Indian Ocean by this method.

Currently both the Chinese and Burmese Ministries of Communications, as well as the Yunnan provincial government, are working on a draft accord on land and water co-ordinated transport involving the Irrawaddy River which originates in Tibet and runs through northern and western Yunnan and then into Burma.

The group carried out the study on land transport routes linking up Dehong Dai-Jingpo Autonomous Prefecture in Yunnan and the Burmese ports of Bhamo and Myitkyina, and other water transport routes connecting with Rangoon, capital of Burma.

Experts in the group were of the opinion that it was feasible to open such a channel along the Dehong--Bhamo land route and the Bhamo--Rangoon water route.

The highway linking the Dehong Prefecture in Yunnan Province and Bhamo in Burma can be readily converted to a high-grade road, and the river section between Bhamo and Rangoon enjoys sound transport conditions. Some of the Bhamo--Rangoon section can accommodate vessels of over 3,000 tonnage. Rangoon is considered an ideal transfer port bordering as it does on the Indian Ocean.

It is expected that construction of a terminal in Rangoon with nine berths for vessels of over 10,000 tonnage will be completed this year, and it can provide an all-weather shelter for vessels of up to 15,000 tonnage.

The proposed transport network can cut short the journey time by about one week compared with the route of between 3,000 and 5,000 kilometres along coastal areas in southeastern China.

BANGKOK, April 1 (Xinhua) -- Thai Prime Minister Chawalit Yongchaiyut said that "Thai-Chinese relations are now moving in an even smoother and steadier direction."

In an interview with Bangkok-based Chinese correspondents before his official visit to China from April 2 to 5, Chawalit said, "ties between the two countries are not ordinary ones. Thailand and China have special relational and brotherly feelings."

This is where Thai-Chinese relations differ from any other country-to-country relations, he said.

Commenting on China's reform and opening up, he said, "Like the Chinese people, the Thai people are also very happy to see China's growth and development trend in recent years."

Recalling the development of bilateral relations during the past two decades since the two countries established diplomatic relations in 1975, the Thai prime minister said that during the first decade the two countries built mutual understanding and confidence and they jointly played an active role in maintaining peace in the region.

He said the second decade was one for bilateral cooperation in economic and social development. The two-way trade increased with each passing year and China had become a most preferred country for Thai investors.

He said the first ten years in the next century "should be an important period for furthering their bilateral ties." The two countries need to work out programs for cooperation in line with each country's national economic and social development programs.

He added that the two countries can also enhance cooperation on the international arena in the fields of political, economic and social affairs.

Congratulating on China's great achievements in its modernization efforts and economic reform, Chawalit said that during the past two decades the living standard of the majority of the Chinese people had improved and are still improving.

Chawalit believed that each country has the right to choose its own way of carrying out realistic reforms in accordance with the country's social reality. He also expressed his belief that the Chinese leadership does not want instability to occur and that among China's priorities are tapping its economic potentials and improving the quality of life of the people in hinterland, in particular the western provinces.

On China's political and economic relations of cooperation with the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), Chawalit said that the two sides are complementary and both have rich political and economic potentials.

China's cooperation and close relationship with ASEAN will not only be beneficial to both sides, but also contribute to the stability of the Asia-Pacific region, he said.

China became a dialogue partner to ASEAN in July 1996 and it is also a participant in the ASEAN regional forum, Chawalit said, adding that Thailand is pleased with these because the links will serve as bridges between China and ASEAN members.

Chawalit said that geopolitically speaking, China, now a close neighbor of ASEAN, will be adjacent to the grouping when Myanmar, Laos and Cambodia join ASEAN in the near future.

Relations between China and ASEAN will be even closer, when land and waterway transport networks are linked within the framework of the quadrangle growth area. The networks are expected to play an important role in strengthening the economic links between China and ASEAN, he noted.

On Thailand's trade links with Hong Kong after July 1, 1997, Chawalit said, the handover ceremony at midnight of June 30 will be an important event in China's history.

He believed that the handover will help build confidence of the international community in Hong Kong's future.

He said that the Thai government is confident in Hong Kong's future, believing that the Chinese government will be able to maintain Hong Kong's stability and prosperity, as well as its status as an international trade and financial center.

After Hong Kong's return to China, Chawalit said, trade between Thailand and Hong Kong will not be adversely affected, but will instead grow.

Title: Thailand: Foreign Ministers 'Firmly' Support Burma's ASEAN Entry

Document Date: 29 Apr 1997

Hong Kong AFP in English 1202 GMT 29 APR 97

Subslug: Report by Matthew Pennington

PHUKET, Thailand, April 29 (AFP)--The foreign ministers of Thailand and the Philippines said Tuesday they were firmly in support of Burma's entry into the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) despite US opposition.

Speaking at the close of a Thai-Philippines joint commission meeting here, both foreign ministers said the US position would be considered but stressed the strategic importance of integrating Burma into the grouping.

"ASEAN involvement with Myanmar is constructive engagement and our relations with Myanmar, being a close neighbor, is one that has strategic implications -- not only in the single dimension of human rights,"

Philippine Foreign Affairs Secretary Domingo Siazon said.

Seven-member ASEAN maintains a policy of promoting diplomatic and economic ties with Burma despite calls from western nations to isolate Rangoon's military junta which assumed power in 1988.

ASEAN, which Burma is expected to join this year at the same time as Cambodia and Laos, groups Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Last week Washington announced investment sanctions for US companies in Burma and said it was lobbying ASEAN states to turn down Rangoon's bid to become a full ASEAN member.

Siazon said Washington should appreciate ASEAN's position on Burma in light of how the United States had amended its policy towards China.

"The US has shifted its policy towards China from an essentially one-dimensional relationship of human rights towards a more comprehensive relationship that embodies other factors," he said.

Thai Foreign Minister Prachuab Chaiyasarn said Thailand respected the US position, but stressed the decision on Burma's admittance -- as well as Cambodia and Laos -- would be determined by their readiness to meet the obligations of ASEAN membership.

He said these obligations would include their ability to accede to the ASEAN Free Trade Area, under which trade barriers in the region would be virtually all dismantled in the next decade.

"Every decision will be based on reason -- not on emotion or various emerging circumstances," Prachuab said.

However, Siazon also said domestic political turmoil in Cambodia could affect its ability to meet ASEAN requirements.

The "internal political situation could pose difficulties for Cambodia in complying with AFTA and the other commitments," he said.

Asked if a possible delay could mean a postponement of admittance for Laos and Burma as well, he said "anything was possible."

In December ASEAN said all three would be admitted simultaneously.

ASEAN foreign ministers are due to meet in May to discuss the timing of their admittance, expected to be in July or September, which would realise the group's ambition for a 10-nation ASEAN in its 30th anniversary year.

Saroj Chavanaviraj, Thai permanent secretary for foreign affairs, said that "unless something very drastic happens, all would be admitted in 1997."

Kunming, May 4 (Xinhua) -- China's border areas, which are usually inhabited by ethnic minorities, have gained economic strength through opening up to the outside world, according to a recent conference held here.

In recent years, the Gross Domestic Product of open cities in border areas has grown with an annual rate of 15 percent. In 1995, the volume of border trade totalled 3.3 billion US dollars.

China's land borders stretch across more than 20,000 km, with 15 neighboring countries.

China's border areas include 135 county-level areas, of which 107 are managed by ethnic minorities.

The ethnic minorities are usually the Same origin of the people living in the neighboring countries. In the past, the areas were economically underdeveloped due to the China's strict restrictions on trade with other countries.

Since China initiated reform and opening-up policies in 1979, the border areas have become the country's vanguard in conducting economic and technological exchanges with foreign countries.

Southwest China's province of Yunnan, which borders Myanmar, Laos, Vietnam, has convenient conditions for border trade because it shares a boundary of 4,061 km with these countries.

The province focused its border trade with southeast Asian countries by taking advantage of Lancang-Mekong River. It has set up 19 ports of entry in frontier prefectures and has opened more than 100 roads for foreign trade and cross-border tourism.

By 1995, the imports and exports volume generated from border trade in the province had reached three billion yuan (about 365 million US dollars), maintaining an annual growth rate of 30 percent for 11 consecutive years. Border trade has spurred the economic development of border areas. By the end of 1995, industrial and agricultural output value of the country's border counties totalled 78.4 billion yuan.

Title: China: Yunnan Ready To Develop New Trade Route to Indian Ocean

Document Date: 5 May 1997

Kunming, May 5 (XINHUA) -- According to authoritative sources from southwest China's Yunnan Province, China has reached an agreement with the Myanmar [Burma] Government on the joint development of Irrawaddy River, a major inland river of Myanmar, to open a new, short channel to the Indian Ocean.

Local officials say the move is "of profound impact" for China's general opening-up, but especially for opening-up drive in southwest China, whose inland location and poor transport system have impeded economic development.

According to the plan, the channel starts from Kunming, Yunnan's provincial capital, and extends along China's No. 320 National Road.

Entering Myanmar via Ruili, a land port in southernmost Yunnan, the road goes about 100 kilometer further to Bhamo, a major harbour of the Irrawaddy River. From the harbour 1,300 kilometers down the river is Rangoon, capital city of Myanmar and a sea port to Indian Ocean.

Transport experts indicate that the new route provides a convenient channel for China and Myanmar. "There is no need to make a detour from Strait of Malacca to enter or exit southwest China," one expert notes.

"Still an inland province, the land ports along the Sino-Myanmar border in the future could be a trade entrepot for surrounding inland provinces, including China's most populous Sichuan Province and the underdeveloped Guizhou Province.

Compared with the traditional routes linking Kunming to major seaports, such as Shanghai, Guangzhou, and Facheng of Guangxi, the distances can be shortened 5,800 km, 3,400 km and 2,050 km, respectively.

"The trade volume between China's inland provinces and other countries in and out of the region is expected to soar after the opening," he concludes.

Conditions now are ripe to push forward the project which was initiated in the early 1980s. The stable political situation in north Myanmar and good neighborly relationship between the two countries are believed to be an impetus to the project. Sources revealed that China and Myanmar are to sign a land-river joint transport agreement in the second half of this year. The two countries will also give the go-ahead for co-building some industrial and agricultural projects in Bhamo.

According to local officials, the border trade between the two countries has thrived since the mid-1980s. The trade volume between the two countries last year was 410 million US dollars.

Document Date: 13 Jun 1997

Bangkok The Nation in English 16 May 97 p A6

Report by Kulachada Chaipipat

Burma's ambivalent position on economic cooperation to open up the upper Mekong River could largely be attributed to security concerns over the participation of the rebellious Shan state and fears of external influence, Thai and Chinese scholars told a seminar yesterday.

Rangoon's agreement to cooperate within the quadrangular economic framework had not been backed by action, despite its pressing need to develop its border area a region hard-hit by the economic failure of 26 years of Burmese socialism, they said.

Speakers pointed to Burma's repeated postponement of an inter-government meeting it is due to host to conclude a pact for the navigation of the Mekong River in Yunnan, in southern China, Thailand and Laos. Another example was the delay in the construction of a road linking Chiang Rai with Yunnan, via Burma's Keng Tung township in the eastern Shan State.

"Although Myanmar (Burma) has several concerns about joining this economic framework, their leaders have never rejected outright their participation in the projects," Huang Guan Yang, a lecture at the Yunnan Institute of International Studies, said. ? Pornphimol Trichote, a researcher at the Institute of Asian Studies, said despite Burma's move towards economic reform and a more open foreign policy since 1988, lingering security problems along its eastern border were delaying its participation in quadrangular cooperation.

Pornphimol said Burma spent four years making little progress on the road from Keng Tung town to Yunnan. This was not simply because of a lack of funds. She believed the Burmese leaders' reluctance to accept a soft loan when first offered by Thailand in 1995 to improve the road was a delaying tactic, rather than the official explanation that Rangoon wanted to undertake the project itself.

Despite the surrender in January of drug warlord Khun Sa, whose Muang Tai Army had controlled part of the western bank of the Salwin River, there was no guarantee of stability in the border region, Pornphimol said. Huang and Pornphimol presented separate research papers on Burma's role in the Economic Growth Quadrangle yesterday, the second and last day of an academic seminar on problems confronting this economic framework, which was initiated in 1993.

The seminar was hosted by the Institute of Asian Studies' Chinese Study Centre at Chulalongkorn University and attended by scholars from Yunnan and Beijing. The first day focused on Laos and Yunnan.

Huang said the Burmese government feared that enabling navigation along the 270 kilometres of the upper Mekong River which passes through the eastern Shan state would open the country to outside influence, in particular from the United States and China.

This was a particularly sensitive issue because Rangoon was unable to fully control the Shan state. He said the ruling State Law and Order Restoration Council had a genuine concern about the influence of the Wa ethnic insurgency, even though the two sides had made a ceasefire agreement some years ago.

The United Wa Organisation was still active in eastern Shan state, under the leadership of Lin Ming Sien, and controlled the largest remaining opium plantation in the Fourth Special Region.

He said the Burmese leaders feared the economic prosperity that would be fuelled by the economic growth quadrangle would further strengthen the insurgency group.

They also feared that cooperation would lead to the resumption of Chinese assistance to the Burmese Communist Party.

Huang said Yunnan's Xishuangbanna region had since 1991 helped provide agricultural expertise to the Fourth Special Region, which could now produce rice for export and had reduced opium growing.

In February, China and Burma entered into an agreement on narcotics suppression through crop substitution.

Title: China: Lancang-Mekong River Dredging Project Viewed

Document Date: 24 May 1997

Beijing Xinhua in English 0240 GMT 25 May 97

Beijing, May 25 (XINHUA) -- Transportation authorities in southwest China's border province of Yunnan are conducting a dredging project on Lancang River, whose lower reaches outside of China are known as the Mekong.

The ongoing project has made it possible to turn the river into an international economic corridor, according to a report in today's "China Daily" (Business Weekly).

The project, involving 500 million yuan (60 million US dollars) of investment, will enable 300-ton ships to travel to the South China Sea from Saigon, Vietnam, the report said.

The river, the eighth longest in the world, flows 4,800 kilometers through China, Myanmar, Laos, Thailand, Cambodia and Viet Nam.

It is valued for its undeveloped natural and tourist resources and promising trade route. However, ships can not sail on the Lancang River for much of the year due to rapids, sharp curves and shallow water during the dry season.

The dredging work in the river's upper reaches is finished. When the whole project is completed, more vigor will be injected into the already booming border trade, the report said.

Asian Development Bank, the United Nations Development Program and companies from Europe, the United States, Hong Kong and Japan are interested in investing the project, it said.

The annual cargo trade on the Lancang-Mekong River climbed to 60,000 tons in 1996, from 1993's 10,000 tons.

The outlook for border trade has become more favorable because of Chinese, Lao, Myanmar and Thai governments' eagerness to tap the potential of the river, the report said.

Besides conferences and joint investigations, they are negotiating a multilateral cargo transportation agreement to allow direct shipping, it said.

Title: China: River Transport Grows in Yunnan

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-97-169
Document Date: 18 Jun 1997
Beijing Xinhua in English 0236 GMT 19 Jun 97

Kunming, June 19 (Xinhua) -- Before 1949, there was only one large motorized ship in land-locked, mountainous Yunnan Province in the southwest China.

Now, the province has 1,324 km of navigable channels, 50 ports, more than 760 transport vessels, over 1,100 ferry-boats, and nearly 10,000 people to man them. In 1996, its water-transport sector handled 1.58 million tons of goods and 1.58 million passengers.

The great changes have mostly taken place since the '80s, when the country launched its ambitious reform and opening drive. Since then, Yunnan has used financial assistance from the central government and local resources to develop river shipping by clearing waterways, building or renovating ports, and manufacturing or purchasing vessels. A provincial shipping administration was also established.

In 1990, local shipping companies began to cooperate with neighboring countries in exploring the possibility of using the Lancang-Mekong River for international shipping. After this proved feasible, it resulted in the operation of 50 Yunnan-based vessels that cover a 430-km stretch of the Lancang-Mekong in China, Laos, Myanmar and Thailand.

Currently, Yunnan and Myanmar are drawing up plans for water transport along the Irrawaddy River and making it a major part of a water-land transport line between Kunming, the capital of Yunnan, and Yangon, the capital of Myanmar.

Title: China: Renmin Ribao on Admitting Burma, Cambodia, Laos to ASEAN

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-97-199

Document Date: 18 Jul 1997

Beijing Renmin Ribao in Chinese 6 Jun 97 p 6

Subslug: "International Forum" Column by Zong Yang (1350 2254): "Independent Choice"

On 31 May, seven ASEAN foreign ministers held a special meeting and officially decided to accept Myanmar [Burma], Cambodia, and Laos as ASEAN members at the 30th ASEAN Foreign Ministers Conference to be held in July. At a time when the 30th anniversary of the ASEAN founding was being celebrated, ASEAN decided to carry out a plan formulated by its founders for forming an alliance of 10 Southeast Asian countries; this is of special significance and shows that ASEAN is entering a new development stage. ASEAN was officially founded by Malaysia, Indonesia, Thailand, Singapore, and the Philippines on 8 August, 1967. Later on, Brunei and Vietnam were admitted into ASEAN in 1984 and 1995 respectively. The end of the Cold War provided an opportunity for furthering ASEAN integration. The Fifth ASEAN Summit, held in December 1995, adopted a plan to admit Myanmar, Laos, and Cambodia into ASEAN before 2000. Since then, ASEAN integration has been accelerated.

Closer cooperation among Southeast Asian countries is bound to heighten the status of Southeast Asian countries in a new Asia-Pacific pattern. Economic development is a major factor for furthering ASEAN integration. ASEAN hopes to cultivate new growth points, maintain strong reserve economic strength, and enhance competitiveness in the world by opening up new markets and exploiting new resources. Besides, after admitting three new members, ASEAN is expected to expand internal coordination and cooperation and more effectively safeguard its interests in the Asia-Pacific cooperation and economic and security talks.

On the question of admitting Myanmar, ASEAN has had a trial of strength and a struggle with the United States and some other western countries on several occasions. The United States and the European Union [EU] are publicly opposed to ASEAN's admitting Myanmar on the pretext of Myanmar's human rights violations. They have threatened that if ASEAN admits Myanmar, U.S.-ASEAN and EU-ASEAN relations would suffer. However, the ASEAN countries withstood this pressure and declared in no uncertain terms that they are opposed to foreign forces interfering in ASEAN affairs and linking Myanmar's internal affairs with its ASEAN membership. The aforementioned decision made by the latest ASEAN Foreign Ministers Conference showed that ASEAN has become more conscious and more capable of resisting foreign intervention and handling regional affairs on its own.

After admitting Myanmar, Laos, and Cambodia, ASEAN will become a regional block comprising all 10 Southeast Asian countries and boasting a combined gross national product of almost $700 billion. It is believed that an enlarged ASEAN will have a greater impact on regional and international affairs. ASEAN's development and expansion as a bloc of developing countries will definitely further multipolarization of the world and promote regional peace, stability, and economic growth.

As developing countries, China and ASEAN members have shared a wide range of common interests. China has all along supported ASEAN countries in playing a positive role in the region and the world. Besides, China has attached great importance to developing long-term, stable, good-neighborly, and mutual-trust partnership with ASEAN and its members. In recent years, China has rapidly developed relations and continually furthered friendly cooperation with ASEAN countries in political and economic fields and on international affairs as well. Since entering into a partnership of comprehensive dialogue last year, China and ASEAN have further developed a dialogue, consultation, and cooperation mechanism. The two sides have adopted a similar or identical stand on many regional and international issues and conducted fruitful cooperation in many international or regional organizations, including APEC, the ASEAN Forum, the Eurasian Conference, UN, and so on. China and ASEAN have strengthened relations of friendly cooperation on the basis of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, since this conforms to the common interests of the two sides; is conducive to safeguarding regional and global peace and development; and demonstrates broad prospects.

Title: China: Benefits From Burma's Entry into ASEAN Noted

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-97-204

Document Date: 23 Jul 1997

Sourceline: OW2307131197 Beijing Xinhua in English 1156 GMT 23 Jul 97

Rangoon, July 23 (XINHUA) -- Burma, after standing alone for several decades, finally joined the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) today, opening a new chapter in its foreign relations.

Burma, together with Laos, officially became members of the regional grouping, boosting the number of ASEAN members from seven to nine and marking a step closer towards the organization's dream of including all ten Southeast Asian countries in its membership.

Cambodia's scheduled entry into the regional grouping along with Laos and Burma was postponed indefinitely following a decision made at the special meeting of the ASEAN foreign ministers on July 10 because of the latest developments in Phnom Penh.

ASEAN presently groups Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, Vietnam, Laos and Burma.

Burma's entry into ASEAN contributes not only to the development of the country but also to peace, stability and development of the region.

For the first time, Burma participated in the 27th ASEAN Ministerial Meeting held in Bangkok in July 1994 as a guest of the Thai Government.

It became an observer of ASEAN at the grouping's 29th Ministerial Meeting held in Jakarta in July 1996 after its accession to the Treaty of Amity and Cooperation in Southeast Asia at the Brunei Ministerial Meeting in July 1995.

Burma's integration into the regional grouping is seen as not only an opportunity for the country in the development of its economy and trade and attraction of foreign investment, but also a challenge to it in commodity production and market competitiveness, some observers here believed.

According to official statistics, Southeast Asian countries, such as Singapore, Malaysia, Thailand and the Philippines, are investing in Burma with nearly 3 billion U.S. dollars out of the country's total foreign investment of over 6 billion U.S. dollars from 21 countries and regions at the end of May this year.

Burma's joining of ASEAN would also contribute to the transport sector of the Southeast Asian region. The eventual establishment of regional highway and railway networks would in turn promote the economic development of the region.

The country's admission into ASEAN also poses a challenge to its market competitiveness in commodity export since Burma is industrially weak to produce goods for the purpose.

Observers here believe that Burma's economy would be developed at a relatively quicker pace with technical assistance and support of other member countries of ASEAN.

Title: India: Article Views Threat From China's Naval Build-Up

Document Number: FBIS-TAC-97-224

Document Date: 12 Aug 1997

Delhi The Pioneer in English 12 Aug 97 p 16

Subslug: Article by Swaran Singh: "China's Naval Prowesss"

Next to its nuclear weapons, it is China's rapid expansion of its naval build-up that will threaten its neighbouring countries. This is because unlike nuclear weapons, naval warfare and especially use of naval power in making force projections remains a perfectly accepted and legitimate instrument of settling inter-state power equations. Naval power is also more likely to be brought to bear because worldwide the continental partition is now over and most of the future conflicts are likely to shift to the open oceans. And here, the twin factor of China's expanding naval power as also its fast growing consumption levels are going to push China into seeking greater influence and control over open seas.

One example of the things to come was candidly visible during China's recent naval exercises which have been officially described as the largest since their tri-services exercises of 1964. This was also China's 5th military exercise involving its navy during the last two years. Conducted north of Taiwan between July 10-20, 1997 this naval exercise involved over one hundred warships. The aim of this exercise was said to be testing their "naval warfare theories, skills to launch guided missiles" and according to the official brief "the containment weapons were also examined". The exercise, if anything, was clearly projected as a rehearsal for the containment of Taiwan which remains China's next target following the return of Macao in 1999. But is China likely to stop at this? For those who follow China's defence strategy, Beijing has already earmarked its future itinerary. Besides, what is most important to note is that there has been no two opinions and no ad hocism in its implementation. Chinese have plans for emerging as the second most important naval power in the 21st century. By the year 2050, the Chinese plan to catch up with the United States.

Admiral Liu Huaqing, who recently retired as senior vice Chairman of China's most powerful military decision-making organ, the Central Military commission (CMC), is credited to be one man behind China's naval build-up. His offshore defence strategy of 1979 has been carried out step-by-step during these last two decades. This strategy had been originally planned to ensure China's control of the seas from China's coasts to the first island chain that runs from Kurile island in the north of Japan, through Taiwan, the Philippines, and most of Indonesia, thus including the whole of the South China Sea. But considering, China's naval build-up during these last two decades, Admiral Liu has lately been talking of extending China's naval operations farther into the Pacific-to the so called second island chain which then includes Guam, the Marianas, and the Carolines. Similarly, in the Indian Ocean, following its control over the South China Sea, China will still continue to depend on the Middle Eastern oil, which will make ensuring safe passage through the sea-lanes of this region increasingly important to China's economy. The Chinese have also been working in this direction. China and Burma, for example, have already established close military ties that may include the Chinese access to Burmese ports in the Indian Ocean. The two countries have signed military agreements that includes intelligence exchanges, arms sales and Burmese air force and navy officers being trained by China. China has also built extensive military cooperation with Iran which will ensure that at any given time it should be in position to contest any rival power trying to control the shipping through the Strait of Hormuz. Similar arrangements have also been visualised for the Straits of Malacca which is the most crucial checkpoint for the Chinese ships sailing into the Indian Ocean. This transformation in its thinking and environment has also brought about a similar shift in China's naval strategy and priorities. The thrust now is clearly on the offensive and in making projections. The new induction of submarines, larger and modern warships, long-range aircraft are clearly not meant for purely defensive purposes. According to Hong Kong Press the Chinese leader, Jiang Zemin, has approved a plan to accelerate the construction of China's first carrier before the year 2000.

This is further corroborated by the US Office of Naval Intelligence that two 48,000-ton carriers, with up to 40 fixed-wing aircraft apiece, could be built by 2005. Last year, China asked France to consider selling the 36-year-old Clemenceau. By even the most conservative estimates the Chinese naval flagships are expected to prowl in Indian Ocean by the early years of the next millennium. And since naval build-up is known to be a long term venture, those on the receiving end have to start preparing now. For one thing, contribution of Sino-Russian defence cooperation has been the most important factor to transform the profile of China's naval power and will remain the most important factor in China gaining edge in its future build-up. Apart from its Kilo- class attack submarines and Sukhoi-27s and their related technology transfers, China has recently bought Sovremenny-class destroyer's which can carry up to 4,430 mile-range SA-N-17 anti-aircraft missiles, one Kamov KA27 anti-submarine helicopter, extensive electronic warfare systems, and point-defence systems to counter anti-ship missiles and torpedoes. Its large 130mm guns can assist shore-bombardment missions. What makes this ship most alarming is the its main armament: the SS-N-22 supersonic anti-ship missile. This missile was built to counter US Aegis cruisers. It travels at more than twice the speed of sound and skims across the water as low as 23 feet, which decreases the chance of radar detection. When it approaches its target, it can execute pre-programmed evasive manoeuvres to confuse defending guns and missiles.

Besides, China has also improved its indigenous production and emerged as the sixth largest shipbuilder from being 16th a decade earlier. China now is building a very capable 23,000 ton replenishment ship for Thailand that also could be built for its own navy. Similarly, it has also come out with a whole range of medium and short range missiles which has reduced the dependence of its naval ship on air defence. Thus any one who continues to ignore China's recent naval expansion and describe its naval warships as of 1950s vintage will be doing so at one own peril.

Kunming, August 17 (Xinhua) -- The Chinese government recently officially approved the construction of another large hydro-power project in Lancang River in southwest China's Yunnan Province bordering Myanmar [Burma] and Vietnam.

Dachaoshan Power Plant, located in the middle reaches of the Lancang River, is designed to have an installed capacity of 1.35 million kw. The power generating capacity is set to reach 5.9 billion kwh annually in its initial period of operation, and eventually hit seven billion kwh a year. With an investment of 8.9 billion yuan, the first generating unit of the plant is scheduled to be operational in 2001. All the six units are expected to be in full operation in 2003.

The site of the project, with a steep water drop and sparse population, is ideal for such a large project.

The Dachaoshan Hydro-power Co. Ltd. was the sole developer and future operator of the project, which is jointly funded by State Development and Investment Corporation, Yunnan Hongta Industrial Co. Ltd., Yunnan Electricity Corporation and Yunnan Development and Investment Corporation. Up to now, some 1.2 billion yuan has been allotted for the preparation of the project. Water diversion tunnels, key to the damming of the river, have been put in use since May of 1996.

Title: Singapore: Controversy Over Burma's Attendance at ASEM Meet Viewed

Document Number: FBIS-EAS-97-246

Document Date: 3 Sep 1997

Sourceline: BK0309123997 Hong Kong AFP in English 0903 GMT 3 Sep 97

SINGAPORE, Sept 3 (AFP) - Fellow ASEAN members reacted guardedly Wednesday to outspoken Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad's threat to boycott next year's Asia- Europe summit in London if their new member Burma is excluded.

Indonesian Foreign Minister Ali Alatas said Asian countries scheduled to attend the April summit had yet to discuss the possible participation of Burma, officially known as Myanmar, or other countries seeking to join the talks.

"The topic about Myanmar has not been discussed," Alatas said before attending a monthly cabinet meeting in Jakarta.

Alatas pointed out that a country's presence at the so-called Asia-Europe Meeting (ASEM) "is based on individual participation, so it is not a meeting of ASEAN on one side and EU on the other."

Philippine Foreign Affairs Undersecretary Rodolfo Severino said foreign ministers and eventually the leaders of ASEAN would have to first discuss Burma's role in the Asia-Europe dialogue.

British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook said in Singapore on Monday that Burma could not take part in the summit because of European Union (EU) sanctions banning high-level visits by ministers from Burma's ruling military junta.

EU countries accuse the junta of systematic human rights abuses and links to international drug trafficking.

The first ASEM summit was held in Bangkok in 1996. It included the 15 EU members and the then seven members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) -- Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam -- plus China, Japan and South Korea.

Burma was admitted into ASEAN together with Laos last July despite warnings by western countries against the move.

Under an earlier understanding, proposed new participants in the ASEM summit would have to be approved by a consensus of all current members. India, Pakistan, Australia and New Zealand have been clamoring to join the Asian side.

Singapore -- which played the pivotal Asian role in organising the ASEM with France on the European side -- was the first to react to Mahathir's boycott threat, which diplomats said caught ASEAN partners by surprise.

In a statement late Tuesday, a spokesman for the Singapore foreign ministry said that the question of Burma's presence at the summit "does not arise" because no consensus had been reached on any new participants.

"There has been no decision taken on new membership for ASEM II, which has to be decided by consensus. Until a decision is taken, the membership of ASEM II in London will be the same as that of ASEM I in Bangkok."

Mahathir, in an interview with US-based Cable News Network (CNN), threatened Tuesday to "opt out" of the summit if the EU bars Burma from attending.

"We are in ASEAN and other people outside of ASEAN cannot dictate to us who should be members of ASEAN. Either you accept ASEAN as it is or you don't," he said, but clarified earlier reports saying he had warned of an ASEAN boycott.

"I'm not speaking for ASEAN, by the way, I'm speaking for myself. But if I find that other countries are going to dictate to us who should or who should not attend from among us then I think I might opt out," he said.

Mahathir, a vocal self-styled spokesman for the developing world known for strong anti-western views, had boycotted a summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum in the United States in 1993, but later became a key backer of the organization.

Malaysia will host an APEC summit in late 1998.

KUALA LUMPUR: Myanmar's attendance at the Asian-Europe Meeting (Asem) scheduled to take place in London next April has yet to be decided, Foreign Minister Datuk Seri Abdullah Ahmad Badawi said.

Even Laos, he said, had not received any official invitation from London to attend the summit.

"By rule, countries have to receive official invitations. They will not be invited to attend as part of the Asean regional grouping," he said. He was commenting on reports which quoted Britain's foreign secretary Robin Cook as saying last week that Myanmar could not attend the meeting in view of a visa ban on Myanmar's ministers in Europe.

Cook's statement had drawn criticism from Datuk Seri Dr Mahathir Mohamad that he might boycott the meeting if Europe dictated to Asean who could attend.

Myanmar and Laos were admitted into Asean on July 23.

Asem groups the 15 European Union countries and 10 Asian states comprising China, Japan, South Korea and the Asean Seven (excluding Myanmar and Laos).

Here in this region, 500 million people of different cultures and faiths reside in varying geographical conditions, in the plains, on the hills and on islands. When undisturbed in the past, the people of the region enjoyed life fully under their respective rulers. However, South-East Asia is a region of strategic importance, politically, militarily, economically and culturally, for it is wellknown for the fertile land, rich mineral deposits, long coastline, ancient cultural structures and glorious historical background. Located in an area bordered by the world's two most populous nations, China and India, the region attracted the attention of big powers. That was why the entire area, with the exception of Siam or Thailand, was overrun by the imperialists. In spite of unmatching strength of weaponry, the people of the region rose against the intruders with available weapons. Finally, they were able to wrest back their lost freedom. Still, the former rulers attempted to wield their influence over them in one form or another. The peoples of the region, on their part, were on alert because of their bitter experience under alien rule. They realized that there lurked constant danger of foreign domination unless they remained united.

The Association of South-East Asian Nations, ASEAN, was founded on 8 August 1967 in Bangkok, Thailand, with the signing of the Bangkok Declaration by the five original Member Countries, namely, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand. The Bangkok Declaration united the ASEAN Member Countries in a joint effort to promote economic cooperation and the welfare of the peoples in the region. The declaration set out guidelines for ASEAN's activities and defined the aims of the organization.

The ASEAN nations came together with three main objectives in mind:
To promote the economic, social and cultural development of the region through cooperative programmes;

To safeguard the political and economic stability of the region against big power rivalry;

To serve as a forum for the resolution of intra-regional differences.

In the Bangkok Declaration, ASEAN clearly stated its vision: "The Association represents the collective will of the nations of Southeast Asia to bind themselves together in friendship and cooperation and, through joint efforts and sacrifices, secure for their peoples and for posterity the blessings of peace, freedom and prosperity."

Accordingly, at the First Summit of the grouping in Bali, in February 1976, the five Member Countries signed the Treaty of Amity and Cooperation in Southeast Asia and the Declaration of ASEAN Concord. The two documents signified ASEAN's aims towards ensuring regional peace and stability and to foster economic and social growth and enhancing the need for cooperation with all peace-loving nations.

The Second Summit in 1977 commemorated the association's tenth founding anniversary and assessed the progress in the implementation of the decisions taken at the previous summit.

When the Third Summit took place in Manila, the Philippines, in December 1987, the Member Countries signed the Manila Declaration and set up the ASEAN Plan of Action. The Protocol Amending the Treaty of Amity and Cooperation in Southeast Asia was also signed to enable countries outside ASEAN region to accede to the Treaty.

The ASEAN Heads of Government signed the Singapore Declaration of 1992 and the Framework Agreement on Enhancing ASEAN Economic Cooperation at the Fourth Summit. An outcome of the summit was the decision to set up the ASEAN Free Trade Area (AFTA) within 15 years. The members also signed the Agreement on the Common Effective Preferential Tariff (CEPT) Scheme which is the main instrument to establish AFTA.

The Fifth Summit held in Bangkok, Thailand, in December 1995, was a remarkable one. At this summit the ASEAN Leaders met with their counterparts from Cambodia, Laos and Myanmar, the three nations outside the ASEAN fold. For, Brunei Darussalam joined the association on 8 January 1984 and Vietnam became the seventh member on 28 July 1995. This initial meeting of all the leaders of the ten Southeast Asian states witnessed the signing of the Southeast Asia Nuclear Weapon-Free Zone Treaty.

At the Fifth Summit, the ASEAN Leaders agreed to meet informally every year and the First Informal Meeting of the ASEAN Heads of Government was held in Jakarta on 30 November 1996. At this meeting, the ASEAN Leaders reaffirmed their strong commitment to the speedy realization of an ASEAN comprising all ten Southeast Asian countries. As far as Myanmar is concerned, it was involved to become a member of ASEAN when it was first established in 1967. However, it did not participate in the Association because of its priorities and prevailing conditions in the international arena at the time. Although not a member of ASEAN, Myanmar was able to develop close and cordial ties with all the countries of Southeast Asia in consonance with its independent and active foreign policy.

Then, Myanmar decided to take a more active role in regional and international affairs. This has been because of Myanmar's belief that there should be appropriate changes in the way of thinking and concepts in accordance with the changing times. In the contemporary world, no nation can stay aloof or isolated. That was why Myanmar decided to enter ASEAN in keeping with her political, economic and foreign policy interests.

Myanmar's stand was highly appreciated by all the ASEAN members. They did so in spite of attempts by some malcontents to bar Myanmar's membership in the ASEAN. The grouping first decided that the three nations, Cambodia, Laos and Myanmar would be integrated into ASEAN fold simultaneously and that they would be admitted in July 1997.

However, when the 30th ASEAN Ministerial Meeting took place in Kuala Lumpur on 23 July 1997, ASEAN welcomed Laos and Myanmar into its fold. Due to unexpected internal developments in Cambodia, the country's membership was deferred to the future.

ASEAN on 8 August 1997 turned 30. Three decades is sufficient enough to assess achievements of the past and look to the future. During this period, the ASEAN has virtually realized the vision of its founding fathers to establish a regional community of all ten states in Southeast Asia "binding themselves together in friendship and cooperation and, through joint efforts and sacrifices, secure for their peoples and for prosperity the blessings of peace, freedom and prosperity".

ASEAN countries can proudly claim a generation of uninterrupted peace as a part of their heritage. With peace and stability prevailing, ASEAN Member Countries have enjoyed sustained economic development and social progress. Today, ASEAN is the fourth largest trading entity in the world and also one of the most dynamic with its GDP showing an average growth rate of about seven percent over the past decade. With the eventual full complement of ten members, the ASEAN region will represent a market of about 500 million people and a regional GDP of almost US$ 700 billion.

A study of ASEAN's success will show that a number of factors have contributed to it. First, its members have not set their sights too high, preferring to progress slowly but surely in the pursuit of modest and realistic targets and have been pragmatic in their approach. Through close consultations and consensus they have been able to build mutual trust and confidence. By taking small and measured steps they have laid a strong foundation on which to build a prosperous and progressive ASEAN.

The next factor is that the voices of all Member Countries carry equal weight, regardless of their size, or stature. Everybody's view is heard and respected. It is a partnership in which the big have not imposed their will on the small, and all have worked together for mutual benefit.

Another tenet of the Association is respect for sovereignty and independence of each Member Country and non-interference in each others' internal affairs. There is also no recourse to the use of force or even the threat to use it. Bilateral disputes have been peacefully resolved through dialogue and negotiation in the spirit of ASEAN friendship and solidarity.

ASEAN maintains contacts with its main trading partners by establishing the dialogue process. There are now ten Dialogue Partners: Australia, Canada, China, the European Union, India, Japan, the Republic of Korea, the Russian Federation, and the United States of America. The dialogue has enabled ASEAN to raise issues covering trade and economic matters, the transfer of technology, human resources development, and technical and development assistance. The number of partners has increased to 11 with the addition of the United Nations Development Programme. On the economic front, the intra-ASEAN cooperation has intensified in the last five years. The ASEAN Free Trade Area or AFTA, which will be established by 2003, aims to reduce tariffs to 0-5 percent and eliminate non-tariff barriers to trade. There are signs that the target will be achieved well ahead of the deadline.

On the political level, the ARF has now become a well established institution where issues relating to peace and security, confidence-building measures and preventive diplomacy are discussed between ASEAN and its Dialogue Partners. In the functional areas too, the emphasis will be on implementing the various action plans in sectors such as environment, science and technology, culture and information, social development, and narcotics control. The above is an assessment on the objective conditions in favour of the ASEAN. All members look forward to a bright future and realization of the original aims. At the same time, it is to be admitted that prevailing conditions, especially, the response of some of the Dialogue Partners is not warm. A case in point is fluctuation of most of the ASEAN national currencies followed by massive speculation. There will be refutations of involvement but there are obvious reasons to believe that they are behind the speculation.

This alone indicates that ASEAN nations have to unite based on self-reliance. In this modern world, military might has no role so long as nations can establish the Zone of Peace, Freedom and Neutrality. To realize this, it is necessary to direct at flourishing the AFTA and bringing about deeper economic integration so as to achieve ASEAN Economic Commonwealth and to see that ASEAN members are economically strong by the year 2020.

In his message on the occasion of ASEAN's Thirtieth Anniversary on 8 August 1997, Chairman of the State Law and Order Restoration Council says:

"ASEAN has been enormously successful in establishing the firm foundation of this region. I am confident that the combined strength of our populations, national and human resources, and the Asian spirit of determination to see things through, will bring about the realization of the visions enumerated thirty years ago. Indeed, we in Myanmar pledge our most sincere effort to contribute positively towards the achievement of all the aspirations that ASEAN holds for the peoples of South-East Asia."

There can be no doubt about the eternal values envisioned by the ASEAN three decades ago. ASEAN at present faces challenges and there are signs at the same time that they will be overcome with determination and united action. As the member nations move towards closer collaboration in the various fields of cooperation, all will be enhancing their identity as Southeast Asian citizens, with similar historical backgrounds and deep-rooted cultural links.

In fact, all the Southeast Asian nations have rich experience in all fields under alien rule or after regaining their freedom. Through sincere consultation and cooperation among the members what one envisages of ASEAN in the year 2020 is magnificently bright. This will be realized through strong determination and sustained efforts.

Beijing, September 17 (XINHUA) -- Under the current international situation, the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-Existence, initiated jointly by India, Myanmar [Burma] and China in the 1950's, are still necessary for successful inter-state relations.

This is the shared view of Indian Ambassador to China Vijay Kunhianandan Nambiar and Myanmar Ambassador to China U Set, in their recent exclusive interviews with Xinhua.

Nambiar said that the new international political and economic environment is characterized by a much higher degree of interdependence between nations, and that nations of the world have a better appreciation of global security and are more interested in each other's development. "This reinforces the relevance and usefulness of the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-Existence," Nambiar stressed.

With the growing emphasis on economic development, he noted, relations between states are increasingly based on cooperation for mutual interest and benefit, and international norms need to pay attention to the poorer countries of the Third World.

In international political and security matters, it is necessary to establish equitable and non-discriminatory international orders, Nambiar said.

Set said that the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-Existence still has significance in today's world, noting that these principles have stood the test of time and have matured over the years, thus setting a norm for inter-state relations.

Myanmar is confident that the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-Existence will "play even greater role in inter-state relations in the future," Set said.

He held that only when relations among countries, big and small, are based on respect for equality, non-interference and sovereignty, will there be peace and harmony in the world.

He said that China's foreign policy has helped relax international tensions and build stability around the world. "India has consistently respected China's long-term interests and upheld the principle of 'one China'," hoping to develop cooperative and constructive relations with China for the next century, he noted.

Set said that China is making an all-out effort to implement its independent foreign policy of peace. Myanmar-China friendship is firmly based on the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-Existence, and bilateral friendship and cooperation have been continuously strengthened and developed, he said.

He said that he hoped to further strengthen the existing mutually beneficial ties through joint efforts based the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-Existence.

The two ambassadors agreed that China's further development will contribute to regional and world prosperity and stability, hoping that China can play a greater role in regional and international affairs.

Border trade between Yunnan and its neighbors is already much better, thanks to the improved communication conditions, and goods from other parts of the country are even being exported via the province's highway network.

Title: India: Indian Interest in Pacific Asia Viewed

Document Number: FBIS-NES-97-287

Document Date: 14 Oct 1997

Sourceline: BK1410122197 Calcutta The Telegraph in English 11 Oct 97 p 12

Subslug: Article by Kanti Bajpai, associate professor at the School of International Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi:

"What Seas, What Shores"

India has rediscovered Pacific Asia. A combination of factors caused to disengage from the region from the late Fifties to 1991. These included India's uneasiness after Bandung conference, 1955, its defeat by China in 1962, United States hostility to Indian role in the region as well as fears about its growing military capabilities in the Eighties. Since 1991, however, in concert with some regional states and the US India has reawakened to Pacific Asia. The end of the Cold War, the rise of China as a great power and India's economic reforms have encouraged both sides to engineer New Delhi's quiet return to the region.

New Delhi has three interests in Pacific Asia. First, with the end of the Cold War US power must be "balanced" to the extent this is possible on key issues. Obviously, balancing in a strict sense is not feasible given the US is the sole superpower. In addition, New Delhi recognizes that a partnership with the US in economic and diplomatic matters is desirable. But Washington's stand on select issues is troublesome, particularly on proliferation but also human rights, trade and intellectual property rights and global environmental issues.

What South Block wants, therefore, is to cultivate as many other centres of power as a way of giving it some greater degree of manoeuvre with Washington. New Delhi sees the Association of Southeast Asian Nations in particular as facing a structurally similar problem with respect to Washington: torn between the desire for partnership with and the need to balance against US power on specific issues. India is aiming therefore for a loose but subtle engagement with southeast Asia in diplomatic terms. Second, and more important, the rise of China is pushing India towards the region. China is either an expansionist power or an embattled giant at the centre of an Asia wide "security dilemma". In either case, India sees dangers ahead. New Delhi's interest is to team up with the southeast Asian states.

If China is expansionist, then an alliance with ASEAN may be a stabilizing influence. This is clear from India's Myanmar policy. Having ditched its pro democracy policy, New Delhi embarked on a diplomatic and economic engagement with Yangon to restrict Chinese influence. However, given the limited nature of its relations with Myanmar, it has lined up with the ASEAN policy of "constructive engagement", rather than the Western policy of sanctions.

If, on the other hand, the problem is that a pattern of mutual suspicions and arms acquisitions is engendering a security dilemma across the face of the continent -- with China and the rest of the continent not sure who is on the defensive and who is on the offensive -- then an Asian cooperative security architecture with ASEAN at the core may help overcome misperceptions and misconceptions on all sides.

Third, and most important, New Delhi's interest in Pacific Asia is economic rather than diplomatic and military. As things stand, 50 per cent of India's cumulative foreign direct investment inflow and outflow since 1991 and 40 per cent of its global trade have been accounted for by Pacific Asia. India needs markets for its exports, FDI to trigger and sustain rapid economic growth and technology to improve productivity and competitiveness.

While the US and Europe are key partners in all three areas, India would like to reduce its dependence on the West. Since economic relations and political influence are thought to be related, New Delhi would prefer to widen the web of economic interactions as a way of balancing Western political influences. Pacific Asia is attractive in this regard. While Indians continue to be suspicious of economic links with the West, this is not the case with fellow Asians.

Four factors constrain India's role in Pacific Asia: India's proliferation policies and attitudes; the quantum and purposes of Indian power; New Delhi's relations with the rest of south Asia; and India's economic and political stability.

While India feels it has acted with restraint on nuclear and missile issues this view is not altogether shared by Washington or various Pacific Asians. Nevertheless, the degree of divergence here is shrinking.

The Indian prime minister has repeated that India has no plans to go nuclear at this juncture. The US seems increasingly prepared to live with India's present policy of nuclear and even missile "ambiguity". Pacific Asia generally lines up behind US non-proliferation concerns, but, apart from Japan, no one has shown any great activism on the issue. Indeed, there is a subterranean feeling in the region that an Indian nuclear capability -- if not an over deployment -- is a reassurance against gains in Chinese power.

The second constraint on India's role in the region is how its power and intentions are perceived. New Delhi's links with the Soviets during the Cold War, its stand on various regional issues (Cambodia, Vietnam) and its growing naval power during the Eighties -- all these evoked suspicions in Pacific Asia. With the end of the Cold War and changes in regional relations, the first two disjunctures have disappeared.

If India's naval power disturbed the region, this rested largely on Cold War concerns and on New Delhi's ineptness. Since 1991, fears over the Indian navy have subsided, in large part because India has reached out to the region's navies. It has exercised with almost all the southeast Asian navies and has invited them to its annual gathering, "Milan". Declining defence spending and the abridgement of India's naval acquisitions have also reduced the fear of Indian power.

The third constraint on a more active Indian role in Asia is its relations with its immediate neighbours. To the extent that New Delhi is seen as distracted by or overbearing in its attitude towards south Asia it is not an attractive partner in Pacific Asia.

This has been comprehended by South Block. It would be facile to say the Gujral doctrine was occasioned by the "look East policy". But it has had the effect of pacifying south Asia and of thereby releasing India from its immediate neighbour hood.

Finally, stability in economic policy and in politics is vital if India is to play a larger role in Asia. As things stand, Pacific Asia's primary interest in India is its market. However, the ups and downs of economic policy continue to dismay the region. New Delhi has put in place most of the important reforms. What is vital is not as much another wave of reforms as working the system that has been put in place.

In addition, improvements in infrastructure and in the working of financial monitoring and regulatory institutions are necessary if investor confidence is to increase. Not unrelated is the problem of political instability. India has had six governments in eight years and only one has completed its term. The other five have therefore, had an average life of seven months. This does not inspire confidence in potential strategic partners.

India has rediscovered Pacific Asia, and the region has turned its gaze towards the second largest country in the world. A more thoroughgoing engagement is possible, with interest on both sides. For the time being though, India and the region are approaching each other modestly with a focus primarily on confidence building, and economic exchange. This is a reasonable programme given various constraints.

Title: Philippines: 'Dubious Result' of ASEAN Policy Toward Burma Viewed

Document Number: FBIS-EAS-97-301

Document Date: 28 Oct 1997

Manila Philippine Daily Inquirer in English 24 Oct 97 p 8

Subslug: Editorial: "Contrasting Perspectives"

FOREIGN Secretary Domingo Siazon is pursuing Asean's "constructive engagement" policy on Burma with mixed, if not dubious, results. Following President Ramos' departure from Burma, which he visited on Oct. 15 to 17, Siazon stayed behind and was allowed by the Burmese junta to meet the opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi at her Rangoon home.

The fact that Siazon made contact with Suu Kyi is a small opening for an Asean dialogue with her, although Siazon is secretive about what this meeting accomplished. Earlier, the junta gave a cold shoulder to a request by Mr. Ramos to meet Suu Kyi. Mr. Ramos is the first Asean head of state to visit Burma after its accession to Asean and in that respect, he has even surpassed the enthusiasm of Malaysia, which insisted on Burma's admission at the Asean ministerial conference in Kuala Lumpur. Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad is not itching to humor the Burmese generals with a state visit.

The dialogue between the President and the junta in Rangoon was rather surreal and bizarre. He urged the regime to moderate its behavior and open dialogue with Suu Kyi. He said that law and order would come through a more democratic government. In the joint communique issued at the end of the Ramos visit, the junta did not waste time to contradict their visitor. They emphasized their "achievements made in establishing political stability and national reconciliation."

The communique reflects sharply the contrasting perspectives between the Philippines and Burma on the question of political rights and, by implication, the futility of a dialogue between two countries who do not speak the same political language. It indicates how little ground the "constructive engagement" approach has made and how difficult is the role played by Manila as an "honest broker" to establish a dialogue between the opposition and dictators.

Siazon often repeats that at least in constructive engagement, one can talk with the junta and something could happen from talking rather than shouting at them and giving them lectures on democracy. The problem, however, is that the non-confrontational Asean approach is not softening the junta at all. There is, however, a political reason behind the rush to admit Burma as Asean's ninth member. The reason is that Asean fears that if Burma were isolated, it would fall into the orbit of China, which is now having extensive economic relationship with Burma. Well, talking of orbit, Burma is already there.

Asean, especially Indonesia, Vietnam and Thailand, fear Chinese hegemony over the region. Partly because of these fears, that also infect the Philippines, it is not important to them whether the State Law and Order Restoration Council troops fire at people or the Burmese remain under the heels of a repressive regime. This China context has doomed efforts by Mr. Ramos and Siazon to moderate the junta which has defied so far Western pressure and threats of economic sanctions in order to force the generals to begin a dialogue with the opposition.

The system has many disadvantages in applying in Myanmar, which has larger expanse from south to north. Every country has chosen map projection system which is suitable to its location, area and shape to produce the most accurate maps in accord with the facts it requires. Myanmar's neighbours China has already adopted Guass Projection System, Thailand UTM Projection System and India Lambert Projection System respectively. Myanmar will transform its system to UTM Projection System. The system is specially appropriated with Myanmar which has greater expanse from south to north and is located near the equator. Introduction of the system in Myanmar has become vital as it is widely used in the world at present and advanced nations are manufacturing machines with the system.

Title: China: Lanchang River Blocked for Power Project

Document Date: 10 Nov 1997

Beijing Xinhua in English 1359 GMT 10 Nov 97

Dachaoshan (Yunnan Province), November 10 (XINHUA) -- The Lanchang River in southwest China was blocked this morning for construction of the Dachaoshan Hydropower Station, the second of its kind on the river. Yunnan Governor He Zhiqiang attended today's damming ceremony and noted that the event symbolizes that China has turned a new page in developing hydropower resources of the river.

The river originates in the Tangula Mountain in northwest China's Qinghai Province and is named Mekong after it enters into Laos, Myanmar [Burma], Thailand and Cambodia.

The 2,000-km Lanchang River, which offers vast potential hydropower resources and untold advantageous conditions, has been listed as a national hydropower development base. Plans call for construction of 14 tiered hydropower stations on the river with a combined generating capacity of 22 million kilowatts.

The Dachaoshan Hydropower Station will be the second one being built on the river, following the one at Manwan.

Dachaoshan will have an installed capacity of 1.35 million kw and will be able to generate 5.9 billion kwh of electricity a year. The first generator is scheduled to go online in 2001 and the entire project will be completed in 2003.

Completion of the station will help alleviate power shortages in southwest China.

The downstream Jinghong Hydropower Station, which will have a designed installed capacity of 1.5 million kw, will involve investments from Thailand and will mainly supply power to that country. Feasibility studies for the project was completed recently.

Preliminary designs for the upstream Xiaowan Hydropower Station have also been completed. The station, with an installed capacity of 4.2 million kw, will be a key project in the development of hydropower resources of the Lanchang River. By adjusting water flow, Xiaowan will enable other stations to generate an extra seven billion kwh of electricity a year.

The design for construction of other hydropower stations is also ongoing.

Title: China: China Daily: Special Economic Zones Proposed

Document Date: 30 Nov 1997

Beijing, November 30 (XINHUA) -- A senior economic researcher has proposed the establishment of three cross-border special economic zones to ginger up China's central and western regions, today's China Daily reported.

Di Kui highlighted three transnational corridors running through zones on the Sino-Russian, Sino-Burma and Sino-Kazakhstan borders: the bridge being constructed between Russia and China's Northwestern Heihe city; the road connecting southwest China's Yunnan Province with Burma, leading finally to the Indian Ocean; and the new Euro-Asia Continental Bridge running from east China's Lianyungang and Rizhao ports through the vast central and western provinces all the way to Rotterdam in the Netherlands. Di suggested that these three transportation corridors, if effectively used, could propel the economy of the landlocked middle and western regions.

Di noticed that due to their small scattered and unorganized nature, the existing cross-border co-operation is too weak to spark the macro-economy of the central and western regions.

Di also proposed that "border processing zones" that could make full use of the abundant raw materials and labor force in these remote areas of China.

Among the three trans-border free economic zones he proposed, Di said that the one bordering Burma is the most mature and the easiest to develop and the zone in northeastern China is "evolving" with China and Russia starting negotiations in 1995.

Di predicted that the northwestern zone on the China-Kazakhstan border will tap the tremendous potential that the new Euro-Asia Continental Bridge contains to boost the economic development of both this region and the whole central and western area.

Subslug: Report by Mukdawan Sakboon

IN A fresh effort to contain widespread trafficking in women, children and illegal immigrants, policy and law makers from six countries in the Mekong sub-region have agreed to set up national committees to address the problem.

Representatives from Burma, Cambodia, China, Laos, Thailand and Vietnam also pledged to meet again by 2000 and expressed hope there will be gains by then in the war against people who traffic in human misery.

The regional conference agreed on Friday the national committees will be authorised to formulate plans of action and programmes to prevent and suppress human trafficking and to seek ways to protect the victims from further abuse, said Saisuree Chutikul, adviser to the National Commission for Women's Affairs.

Legislation should also be enacted to differentiate between trafficking in women and children and organised illegal immigration, added law lecturer Prof Vitit Muntabhorn of Chulalongkorn University.

This should include provisions friendly to women and child victims, to ensure that they are properly treated, and should also cover slavery-like situations and forced labour.

People should be considered victims of trafficking if they are transported by others who used or threaten to use violence, abused by people in authority or positions of dominance, or subjected to deception or other forms of coercion for the purpose of exploiting them sexually or economically for the profit or advantage of others, Vitit said.

Vitit said that to ensure proper treatment of people being deported to their country of origin, bilateral treaties formalising the repatriation process would be drafted, as a mechanism through which a "central authority" could work.

China: PRC: Jiang Zemin Meets Burmese Leader

Dec 15: Kuala Lumpur, December 15 (XINHUA) -- Chinese President Jiang Zemin

and Chairman of the Myanmar [Burmese] State Peace and Development Council Than Shwe today expressed satisfaction with the development of the relations between their two countries.

During a meeting here with Than Shwe, Jiang said that in recent years, the ties between China and Myanmar have maintained the momentum of all-around development and the Chinese government has always attached importance to the promotion of friendly relations with Myanmar.

Jiang pledged that his country would make continuous efforts to promote its neighborly friendship with Myanmar oriented toward the 21st century.

He said the economic and trade cooperation between the two countries has also made remarkable progress in recent years and has great potential for further development.

He expressed the belief that such cooperation will be pushed to a new high through the joint efforts of the two governments and the business circles of the two countries.

Jiang congratulated Myanmar on its joining the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), saying the development and the strengthening of ASEAN is conducive to lasting peace and long-term development in the Asia-Pacific region.

Than Shwe said there exist traditional friendly relations between the two countries, nurtured by their elder leaders.

"We are responsible for and committed to maintaining, consolidating and promoting the friendship between Myanmar and China. We would never forget the support and assistance provided to us by the Chinese government at the time when Myanmar faced difficulties," he said.

Than Shwe briefed Jiang on the efforts and achievements Myanmar has made in its economic development in recent years.

Congratulating Myanmar on the improvement and development of its economy, Jiang said, "The world is a diverse one and each country has the right to choose its social system and road of development in the light of its own conditions." "The domestic problems faced by any country should be dealt with by its own people and the problems faced by the world should be settled by the countries concerned through friendly consultations."

The two leaders also spoke highly of the informal summit of East Asian nations held here today and shared the view that the exchange of views informally by the leaders is conducive to mutual understanding between the countries concerned and to seeking common ground while reserving differences.

Jiang believed that the difficulties faced by Southeast Asian countries would be overcome gradually.

"I am confident of the future of Asia's economic development," Jiang said.

Title: China: 'Roundup' on Burma's Entry Into ASEAN

[Roundup by Zhang Yunfei: "Myanmar's Entry Into ASEAN Opens New Chapter in Foreign Relations"]

Rangoon, December 13 (Xinhua) -- Myanmar [Burma]'s entry into the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) is a major event for the country in the outgoing year of 1997 and has opened a new chapter in its foreign relations.

ASEAN, withstanding pressure from certain Western countries, made its decision to admit Myanmar into the fold of the grouping in July, showing its independence and maturity in dealing with regional issues.

Myanmar's entry into the grouping, from a long-term point of view, is not only conducive to the development of the country, but also to peace, stability and development in the region as a whole, observers here said. Since its integration into ASEAN, Myanmar has been making efforts to work closely with other ASEAN members to share the responsibility of the regional grouping.

Accordingly, Myanmar formed a leading committee on ASEAN affairs in June and then set up respective committees and groups in all sectors to take an active part in meetings and activities of the grouping.

The series of ASEAN meetings Myanmar has attended showed the country's positive response to the cooperation among ASEAN member nations.

At a meeting of the ASEAN Free Trade Area (AFTA) Council and ASEAN economic ministers' meeting in Kuala Lumpur in October, Myanmar presented its commodities list compiled for tariff reduction for the establishment of AFTA which is to bring tariffs down to zero to 5 percent within 10 years after joining AFTA.

In Myanmar's final Common Effective Preferential Tariff (CEPT) packages, there are 2,355 tariff lines (43 percent of its total) in the inclusion list of products and 2,987 tariff lines (54.6 percent of its total) in the temporary exclusion list.

It was decided at the Council meeting that ASEAN will provide technical assistance to Myanmar as well as Laos, its two new members, to help them fulfill their obligations for AFTA.

At an ASEAN agriculture and forestry ministers' meeting in Bangkok in September, Myanmar stressed cooperation among ASEAN member nations in food, agriculture and forestry sectors.

Meanwhile, at an ASEAN transport ministers' meeting in the Philippines' Cebu in September, Myanmar pledged to cooperate with other members in carrying out projects and activities under the integrated implementation program for the ASEAN plan of action in transport and communications sectors.

In drugs control, Myanmar is also making preparations to act as a host in implementing individually and collectively ASEAN members' three-year narcotic drugs control project which was worked out at the 18th meeting of ASEAN Senior officials on Drug Matters (ASOD) in Bangkok in 1995.

In Brunei in August, Myanmar attended the 20th meeting on ASOD which discussed the latest development of each country's anti-drug program and cooperation among ASEAN countries.

In the education sector, Myanmar is planning to revise its education curriculum to conform to the education standards in ASEAN member states, aiming to turn out skilled workers and technicians in the process of human resources development.

With regard to parliamentary affairs, Myanmar promised to cooperate with other member nations in achieving economic well-being of the Southeast Asia region when Chairman of the Myanmar National Convention Convening Work Committee U Aung Toe attended as observer the 18th Working Committee and General Assembly of the ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Organization (AIPO) in Bali, Indonesia, in September.

In financial affairs, Myanmar, together with Laos, signed the memorandum of understanding on multilateral cooperation in ASEAN's financial sector at a special meeting of ASEAN Finance Ministers held in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, early this month.

Myanmar's integration into the regional grouping, which now embraces nine members -- Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, Vietnam, Myanmar and Laos, is seen as not only an opportunity for the country in the development of its economy and trade and attraction of foreign investment, but also a challenge to it in commodity production and market competition.

Since Myanmar was admitted into ASEAN, the Association's Secretary-General Ajit Singh has visited Myanmar twice, the last trip being in November when he led an ASEAN business forum delegation, exploring business cooperation with Myanmar counterparts, especially the private sector.

According to official statistics, at the end of September, investment from other ASEAN countries added up to over 3 billion U.S. dollars, accounting for about 45 percent of the total 6.44 billion dollars of foreign investment in Myanmar. This has helped the country obtain much-needed foreign exchange and promote job creation and economic growth. Observers here believe that with the technical assistance and support from other member nations, Myanmar's economy would develop at a relatively quicker pace which would in turn promote the region's economic, social and cultural development.

Title: China: Report on Informal Summit Held With ASEAN

Document Date: 16 Dec 1997

Kuala Lumpur, December 16 (Xinhua) -- The first informal summit between China and ASEAN here today reached consensus on forging a good-neighborly partnership of mutual trust oriented to the 21st century. Chinese President Jiang Zemin said at the outset of the bilateral summit that China and the nine-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations must give priority to their economic relations and step up mutual support on major regional and international issues to safeguard the interests of developing countries, ASEAN groups Brunei, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar [Burma], the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Jiang said China and ASEAN should draw on each other's advantages and reinforce cooperation in several areas including resources, technology, market, banking, information and investment.

He said China and ASEAN must also intensify dialogue and mutual support in the United Nations, Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation, Asia-Europe Meeting and the ASEAN Regional Forum.

He said the bilateral summit marked the beginning of a new stage of China-ASEAN relations and he also put forth the objectives and guidelines for the development of future relations between China and ASEAN.

ASEAN leaders said that Jiang's presence at the summit shows that China attaches great importance to the relations between China and ASEAN.

They all held the view that China as a major trading partner in the world should join the World Trade Organization as soon as possible.

The ASEAN leaders spoke highly of the guidelines put forth by the Chinese president for the development of future relations, hoping to take the informal summit of East Asian nations and that between China and ASEAN as opportunities to work together for realizing the goal of forging the good-neighborly partnership of mutual trust oriented to the 21st century.

On the disputes over the South China Sea, the leaders of China and ASEAN agreed to resolve them through friendly consultations and negotiations in accordance with universally recognized international law, including the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea.

In a joint statement issued at the end of the China-ASEAN bilateral summit, the leaders expressed satisfaction with the rapidly developing relations between ASEAN and China as well as between individual ASEAN member states and China.

They agreed that the consolidation of these relations served the fundamental interests of their respective peoples as well as peace, stability and prosperity of the Asia-Pacific region.

Double Game for Chinese?

Intelligence Newsletter
December 18, 1997

Security officials in the Chinese border province of Yunnan have been showing special concern for opponents of Burma's regime in recent months. At the behest of their chief, Liu Xuanle, the Gonganting's "Blue Dogs", as they are known, have sounded out dissidents and established close relations with some of them. According to sources in Rangoon, this has infuriated one of the regime's four strong-men, lieut.-gen. Khin Nyunt, head of military intelligence, who fears that the Chinese leadership around Jiang Zemin will start seriously thinking the junta could be toppled and decide to play both sides of the street.

The Chinese and Burmese security services have worked together in Yunnan since 1992 to fight against drug trafficking. And that cooperation goes hand in hand with the new interest in dissidents. Elsewhere, a "cyber war" center set up this autumn in Burma by Khin Nyunt is working to intercept telephone calls, fax messages, mobile telephone communications and e-mail of foreign businessmen whom the government believes could be used by dissidents loyal to Aung San Sus Kyi to pass along messages for them. Along with Japanese businessmen, diplomats from Japan are also being closely watched because of their sympathies for the Nobel prize winner.

Title: China: Burma's Role in Regional Development Noted

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-97-359

Document Date: 25 Dec 1997

Subslug: "Roundup": Myanmar [Burma] Takes More Active Part in Regional Cooperation"

Yangon, December 25 (XINHUA) -- Following its integration into the Association of Southeast Asian Nations in July this year, Myanmar Monday also joined another new regional grouping, the BIMST-EC, signifying the country's increasingly active and positive participation in the regional cooperation. The BIMST-EC (Bangladesh, India, Myanmar, Sri Lanka and Thailand -- Economic Cooperation) is a sub-regional economic grouping along the rim of Bay of Bengal. The originally-formed four-member grouping, initiated by Thailand and founded in June this year, decided to expand its membership to Myanmar in August. A special ministerial meeting of the grouping held Monday in Bangkok, agreed to strengthen cooperation in the fields of trade, investment, transport and communications, energy, tourism and fishery among the member countries. On the issue, an Asian diplomat here said that as a country straddling South and Southeast Asia, Myanmar is destined to play the key role of a bridge in the regional economic cooperation. Today's Myanmar, after standing alone for several decades, comes to realize that the regional economic cooperation has become an acknowledged vehicle for promoting economic development. Myanmar, together with Thailand, is not only a member of the ASEAN but also an associate of the BIMST-EC, thus becoming a gateway for the two groupings to link South and Southeast Asia. Myanmar's successive entry into the two groupings is also seen as a major event for the country in the outgoing year of 1997 and has opened a new chapter in its foreign relations with the nations in the region. Since Myanmar opened its door to the outside world in late 1988, adopting a market-oriented economic system, investment from countries in the region increased year by year. According to official statistics, foreign investment, coming from other ASEAN countries, had increased to over 3 billion U.S. dollars, accounting for about 45 percent of the 6.5-billion-dollar total foreign investment by the end of November this year. With regard to Myanmar's foreign trade, Singapore, Thailand and India are among the country's major trading partners in the region with an annual volume of trade maintaining at a level of about 500 million, 500 million and 250 million U.S. dollars respectively in recent years, according to available figures. The initiation of border trade agreements between Myanmar and Bangladesh, India and Thailand in the last two years has also brought about further development of Myanmar's trade with these countries and promote the regional cooperation. Observers here said that Myanmar's positive response to the cooperation among member nations of the ASEAN and the BIMST-EC would be, from a long term point of view, not only conducive to the development of the country but also to peace, stability and development in the region as a whole. Mid-Year Gems Emporium displays 1,386 lots at reserve price $ 11.37m

YANGON, 16 Oct - A total of 1,386 gems lots at a reserve price of $ 11.37 million are on display at Mid-Year Myanmar Gems Emporium, said Deputy Minister for Mines U Myint Thein today at a Press Conference.

The emporium displays 962 jade lots at a reserve price of $ 5.96 million, 254 gem lots at $ 3.5 million and 170 pearl lots at $ 1.91 million, he added.

Sponsored by Myanmar Gems Emporium Central Committee, it will be held from 16 to 22 October.

The deputy minister, who is chairman of MGECC, estimated that over 300 merchants of 51 companies from 13 countries will attend the emporium to be held at Myanmar Gems Mart, adding invitations were sent to 787 companies of 28 countries.

More quality stones and lots are included in this emporium than in the previous sales as the State is providing assistance to gems miners such as rendering advanced cash and loans and speedy foreign currency services and curbing smuggling gems abroad, he noted.

The reserve prices for the lots are lower than in the past sales due to currency devaluation and economic instability in international scene, he said.

Over 50 new merchants from Canton and Yunnan provinces of the People's Republic of China are expected to attend the emporium, he said, adding coordinations are under way to sell jade blocks to Yunnan by land.

Member of Information Committee of the State Peace and Development Council Deputy Minister for Information Brig-Gen Aung Thein also spoke.

Title: China: Peace Prevails Along Borders in 1997

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-98-036

Document Date: 5 Feb 1998

Sourceline: OW0502135198 Beijing Xinhua Domestic Service in Chinese 0604 GMT 4 Feb 98

Subslug: "Newsletter" by Xinhua reporter Cao Zhi: "Peace Prevails in Thousands of Miles of Border Areas"

At the 15th CPC National Congress which was held in the golden autumn of 1997, General Secretary Jiang Zemin declared to the world: "On the basis of the 1 million troop cut in the 1980's, China will carry out another 500,000 troop cut in the coming three years."

This was the most powerful "voice of peace" China gave forth last year.

As a nation that is creating a new historical situation with redoubled confidence and courage, full of pride and enthusiasm, the 1.2 billion Chinese people are marching toward a new century in peaceful sunshine. A noted expert on international affairs maintained: To the 3 million officers and soldiers of the People's Liberation Army and the thousands of miles of border areas, the greatest achievement in 1997 was peace.

While gazing out at China's endless land frontier, the winding and rugged boundary line, and every border sentry and port, we joyfully saw a bright blue sky over the motherland's frontier, which witnessed rounds and rounds of smoke from gunpowder and experienced constant conflicts in the past.

Thanks to several years of unremitting efforts, a vast belt of security and trust is taking shape in our country's northern border areas.

The boundary bridge of the small frontier town of Jeminay in Altay Prefecture, Xinjiang is situated on the picturesque tributary of the Ertix He. Under the bridge, the water of the river is crystal clear, the banks of the river are covered with thick bushes and on each bank of the river herdsmen graze sheep and cattle freely. Due to the rapid development of border trade, the boundary bridge of Jeminay, which was too small and too old, no longer lived up to its historical mission. Therefore, in the upper reach one kilometer away from the bridge, a new reinforced concrete bridge has spanned the boundary river.

Train whistles have long disturbed the tranquillity of Alataw Pass.

As an important international freight port, Alataw Pass handled 2.3 million tonnes of transit goods last year, ranking second among frontier ports.

While covering the "Good Eighth Company in Heihe," this reporter was informed of this event: In August last year, upon hearing that the Eighth Company was conferred the glorious title of "the Good Eighth Company in Heihe" by the Central Military Commission, the Blagovescensk Border Sentry under the command of the Russian Far East Frontier Military District specially sent its personnel to offer congratulations. They said: "You were named a model by the Central Military Commission of the People's Republic of China while we were named a red sentry by the Russia Federal General Frontier Administration. We must learn from each other and join hands to build an exemplary boundary in the days to come."

People will not forget that at the end of 1960's, these areas were still restricted military areas, where dark clouds covered the sky, and the situation was dangerously explosive.

The doors of the country have been opened to the outside world quietly and the solid ice is melting drop by drop.

Dozens of ports in Heilongjiang, Inner Mongolia, and Xinjiang have been opened to the outside world so far. Frontier guards between China and Russia, between China and Mongolia and between China and Kazakhstan have opened their border sentries to each other.

China and Russia signed "the Agreement on Frontier Cooperation Between the People's Republic of China and the Russian Federal General Frontier Administration" in August 1995.

Heads of state of China, Russia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan signed "the Agreement on Confidence Building in Military Field Along Border Areas" in Shanghai in April 1996.

"The Agreement on Mutual Armed Forces Reduction Along Border Areas" was signed by heads of state of China, Russia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan in Moscow on 24 April 1997.

There is no longer a heaviness in the sky over the thousands of kilometers of northern border areas. When meeting each other on patrol, soldiers of the two countries exchange friendly greetings rather than the clicking of rifle bolts. The common words used in border talks and meetings have also changed. The very frequently used words, such as "protest" and condemn," have given way to "notice" and "inform." Like its northern border areas, our country's southern border areas, which were bleak, desolate, and out-of-the-way in former days, have now presented a completely new scene of harmony, tranquillity, and prosperity everywhere.

Yunjing Village in Ruili City, Yunnan, which is located beside boundary marker No. 71 on the border between China and Burma, is closely linked with Mangxiu Village in Burma with row upon row of houses and bamboo forests.

Villager Han Yue worked a vegetable plot on the national border. Last year when the cucumber was doing well, the cucumber vines extended to the open ground of the Shuai Gen family in Mangxiu Village on the opposite side of the border. Every time he went to the plot, he pulled back the cucumber vines to his plot. Shuai Gen said to Han Yue: "If the cucumber vines are moved, young cucumbers will easily wither and turn yellow. Don't worry about that. After all, the ground is idle." Han Yue said in response: "Well, you can pick the cucumbers growing on your side then."

The brown rocks and white ice and snow on the snow-capped boundary line at an elevation of 4,700 meters in Naiduila, Tibet, form a sharp contrast.

The Chinese and Indian sentries, which are 26 meters apart, are erected on the two sides of wire entanglement. With grains of sand and snow, the wind blows across the sentries, sometimes from the Chinese side and sometimes from the other side. Every day, frontier guards of the two countries convey friendly expressions in their eyes to each other in a unique form, which are understandable to each other.

In winter, snow is dazzlingly bright. There are no books and newspaper for our young soldiers to read and no incoming letters for them to receive for a long time. However, the uninteresting and oxygen-deficient living conditions do not deprive them of their youthful vigor. In the snow-covered basketball court in front of the camp, they were playing basketball.

Wave upon wave of the sound of demolitions were heard from the slopes of the mountain behind Nahua Village in Longzhou County, Guangxi at 1430 on 28 November last year--in accordance with the State Council's and the Central Military Commission's directions, frontier troops stationed in Guangxi started the second minesweeping operations in the border areas of Guangxi.

In the first minesweeping operations, which were carried out in the border areas of Guangxi and Yunnan, an area of 108 square kilometers was cleared of mines. One million or so mines and other explosives were cleared; 19 frontier ports were opened to business; 160 or more thoroughfares were opened to traffic; and an area of more than 500,000 mu of land was returned to production of all types.

Although brilliant achievements were scored in the first minesweeping operations, the mines planted in the border areas have not yet been thoroughly cleared. The remaining mines were mostly planted in barren hills, trackless forests, and open grounds. In the second minesweeping operations, two years will be spent in thoroughly clearing the mines in the border areas between China and Vietnam so as to eliminate the peril of mines from the border areas of the two countries.

Prior to this, the construction of frontier infrastructures, the largest scale construction ever launched since the founding of the People's Republic, has been carried out in a comprehensive way in nine frontier provinces and autonomous regions, including Liaoning, Jilin, Heilongjiang, Inner Mongolia, Gansu, Xinjiang, Tibet, Yunnan, and Guangxi. Approved by the State Council and the Central Military Commission, our country will carry out construction of frontier infrastructures, such as frontier patrol roads, frontier wire entanglements, frontier management supplementary marks, and frontier monitoring facilities, during the Ninth Five-Year Plan period.

A concerned person in charge said: The main purpose of building such-a-colossal-scale projects is to improve frontier patrol conditions, safeguard good order in border areas, and develop good-neighborly friendly relations with neighboring countries.

Building a peaceful, stable, and harmonious border line into a bridge and a tie linking neighboring countries is the dream cherished by generation after generation of frontier guards and people living in border areas. Today the dream is gradually coming true.

The National Frontier Defense Committee conducted a survey of frontier defense infrastructures in fiscal 1996 from July to November last year.

Results of the survey showed: The quality of most completed projects, such as the 1,500-km patrol roads, 500-km wire entanglements, and the 10,000-meter port railings, met and even exceeded the set standards.

Frontier infrastructures have brought about benefits in many ways.

They have helped not only enhance frontier guards' ability to manage and control the frontiers, but also promote the economic development of border areas and make the people's life there more convenient, thus having good influence inside and outside the borders. At border talks and meetings, representatives of frontier defense departments and border areas of many neighboring countries said: "These facilities have effectively standardized frontier and port management order. Building such projects indicates that your country is strong and your nation is prosperous."

"National strength, national prosperity, harmony, and tranquillity" were present throughout China's thousands of miles of border areas in 1997 and its 9.6 million square kilometers of land.

Title: China: PRC Achieves Good Results in Cracking Down on Drugs

Subslug: Feature by Zhongguo Tongxun She reporter Lin Ying: "China Has Achieved Results in Prohibiting Narcotic Drugs, But More Work Has to Be Done"

Hong Kong, 6 Feb (ZTS) -- China's relevant departments achieved the best results last year in combating narcotic drugs by carrying out special projects, initially creating an atmosphere of combating narcotics by all people. However, because drug traffickers are very crafty and often change their trafficking methods and channels, the task of cracking down on the crime of drug trafficking and abuse is still very arduous this year.

According to preliminary statistics by the National Narcotic Control Commission, Chinese public securities organs in 1997 seized more than five tonnes of heroin, the largest amount seized in one year; in addition, they also seized 1.9 tonnes of opium, over 1 tonne of ice [bing du 0393 3021], and more than 350 tonnes of easy-to-make chemicals of various kinds used as narcotics. Meanwhile, procuratorial organs handled more than 10,000 drug-related criminal cases and arrested over 16,000 drug-making and -dealing suspects, and people's courts tried and wound up over 12,000 drug-related criminal cases. More than 180,000 drug addicts were compelled to receive treatment to give up drugs.

Drug-related crime, international terrorism, international organized crime, and international financial and economic crime are listed as four serious public nuisances in the world, and drug-related crimes is the worst of them. Statistics show that there are more than 200 million drug addicts in the world now, and over 200,000 people die from narcotics a year. In recent years, drug-related criminal activities have formed a complete system consisting of planting, processing, trafficking, and marketing, and the amount of drugs sold has increased year by year. The total volume of drug trafficking in the world was estimated at more than $500 billion in 1997 alone, amounting to 13 percent of the world's total volume of trade, greater than the volume of petroleum trade, and next only to the volume of arms trade. Not a single country now is not threatened or harmed by drug-related criminal activities.

China had the good reputation of being "a drug-free country" for more than 30 years, but that was a period in which the country was closed to the outside world. Since China was opened to the outside world in the early 1980s, international drug-trafficking groups and drug traffickers have used the opening-up conditions along the country's borders to establish ties with the drug-producing "Golden Triangle" and to smuggle narcotic drugs from the triangle to international drug consumer markets through Yunnan and Guangxi borders. Meanwhile, lawbreakers in China rushed into danger to seek exorbitant profits by taking part in drug trafficking; they smuggled and sold narcotics to inland cities and rural areas of the country, thus reviving drug addiction in China. According to relevant statistics, China now has more than 530,000 registered drug addicts; however, when calculated according to the international practice of compiling statistics regarding drug addicts, China now should have at least 2 million drug addicts.

According to estimates by the United Nations Narcotic Control Organization, the "Golden Triangle" now produces about 2,500 to 3,000 tonnes of opium a year. Such drug is usually smuggled by international drug trafficking groups in an organized way to narcotics markets in various parts of the world. The China-Burma border is one of the routes along which international drug- trafficking groups smuggle opium.

Drug-trafficking activities in areas along the China-Burma border abated several years ago after investigating and cracking down on them, but such activities have increased since last year. To evade investigation and arrest, drug traffickers continue to change their trafficking means and routes and use such usual international means as hiding narcotics in human bodies and diverting drugs and traffickers; such means have become a common occurrence in China in recent years, and drug traffickers are moving in the direction of being organized and possessing weapons; moreover, drug traffickers at home and abroad have colluded with one another, forming a professional drug trafficking network in which production, supply, and marketing are made a coordinated process. They contact one another with modern communication equipment, use special vehicles for drug transport under armed escort, and resist instigation and arrest with violence. This has increased the difficulty of cracking down on drug-trafficking activities by Chinese public security organs.

In the face of the grim situation in which narcotics are being extensively smuggled into China from the "Golden Triangle," the country's customs and public security organs are carrying out special projects to crack down on drug trafficking; while continuing to step up the crackdown on border drug trafficking, they have also strengthened their supervision and management of easy-to-make chemicals whose export is restricted. For instance, Yunnan customs and public security organs seized more than three tonnes of heroin and opium last year, and the amount of narcotics seized by them accounted for about 50 percent of the country's total. Customs and public security organs in Guangxi, Guangdong, and in Lhasa and Urumqi in the west of the country also seized large amounts of narcotics and easy-to-make chemicals used as drugs, thus effectively cracking down on various drug-related criminal activities.

No 3 Bo Aung Kyaw Wharf boosts container handling capacity of Yangon Port YANGON, 11 Feb - No 3 Bo Aung Kyaw Wharf of Myanma Port Authority was launched this morning at the facility hailing the 51st Anniversary Union Day.

Secretary-1 of the State Peace and Development Council Lt-Gen Khin Nyunt attended and unveiled the plaque.

Speaking on the occasion, Minister for Transport Lt-Gen Tin Ngwe said although No 1 and No 2 Bo Aung Kyaw Wharfs were upgraded from conventional bridges to container bridges in 1990, containers are being handled with cranes on board the ships as these two facilities cannot withstand the installation of modern container carriers.

The No 3 Bo Aung Kyaw Wharf, a modern container bridge, was built under the agreement reached between MPA and Yunnan Machinery and Equipment Import and Export Corporation (YMEC) of People's Republic of China on 21 May 1996, he said.

A modern crane of the No 3 wharf can handle 18 containers per hour and another crane has the capacity to move eight containers per hour, he said, adding conventional wharfs can handle at the rate of only six units per hour.

Opening of this wharf plus four gantry cranes under operation will speed up freight handling work at Yangon Port, he noted.

The wharf with 40-ton capacity cranes can be moored by ships up to 15,000 tons and 30-foot draught, he said.

Foreign technology and investment have been invited in upgrading Yangon Port and building Thilawa Port, he stated.

He thanked the main contractor YMEC, designer The Ninth Design and Research Institute, wharf builder China Harbor Engineering Co (CHEC) and machinery supplier Shanghai Port Machinery Plant (SPMP) and MPA for their efforts.

President of YMEC Mr Lin Zai Yau also spoke.

Lt-Gen Tin Ngwe and Mr Lin formally opened the wharf. ("The New Light of Myanmar" (Internet version) 98-02-12)

The project will jointly be implemented by Myanma Electric Power Enterprise and Irrigation Department of the Ministry of Agriculture and Irrigation.

DATELINE: BANGKOK, Feb 13

Myanmar and China have signed a 250 million dollar loan deal under which Beijing will provide funds for a badly-needed hydroelectric plant for the military-run state, the media said Friday.

The two sides Thursday signed a memorandum of understanding (MoU) to help launch the Paunglaung Hydropower Project near the city of Mandalay in the centre of the country, the official New Light of Myanmar said.

The project, near the town of Pyinmana, will have an installed capacity of 280 megawatts and will annually generate over 900 kilowatts of electricity to be distributed through the national grid.

The deal was signed between the scheme's operator, Myanmar Electric Power Enterprise and the Yunnan Machinery and Equipment Import and Export Corp. Power Minister major General Tin Htut said talks for the scheme had been underway for months and the signing constituted an "important milestone" for the implementation of the scheme.

A shortage of power to help industrialise the nation is one of the key problems afflicting Myanmar's (Burma's) troubled economy.

Foreign investors from the west are reticent about investing in Myanmar amid bad publicity over the junta's human rights record.

Kunming, 16 February (XHK) -- After seven years of hard work, the Fourth Special Region [FSR] in eastern Shan State, Burma, has succeeded in completely banning the growing of poppies since late last year as result of a green anti-drug project the FSR launched with Xizhuangbanna Prefecture in China's Yunnan Province to replace poppy production with grain and economic crops.

The FSR in Shan, a Burmese state adjacent to Xishuangbanna Prefecture's Menghai County, is located in the Golden Triangle and was one of the areas that produced opium and other narcotics with its main crop, poppies. In May 1991, the FSR set up a Special Regional Anti-Drug Committee to take charge of the "Six-Year Anti-Drug Project" it promulgated.

To help Burmese poppy growers solve their living problems after poppy growing was banned, the Chinese side, from 1991 through 1997, helped the FSR develop more than 40,000 mu of hybrid grain (15 mu equal to 1 hectare) with seeds and technical expertise the Chinese side provided. The average per-mu output of the hybrid grain has exceeded 400 kilograms, topping the local traditional variety by 300 kilograms. At the same time, the Chinese side also helped the FSR grow economic crops such as sugarcane, tea leaves, watermelons, rubber, and soy beans.

The Xishuangbanna Public Security Bureau and the FSR have verified that the anti-drug project has reached its first-phase target. To consolidate the achievements and completely eradicate the source of narcotics, the two sides recently decided to proceed with the second-phase cooperation, which will focus on developing sugarcane, fruits, flowers, sunflower seeds, and tea leaves as well as providing training in agricultural science and technology.

Title: China: Chinese Improvements Allow 24-Hour Traffic Along Mekong

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-98-040

Kunming, February 9 (XINHUA) -- China is now offering day and night boat services along the upper reaches of the Mekong River, increasing trade considerably with nearby countries.

The 4,880-km-long river runs through China, Myanmar [Burma], Laos, Thailand, Cambodia, and Vietnam. The 2,130-km section upstream in China is known as the Lancang River.

A fleet of freighters belonging to the China Southwest Water Transport Development Group operates on 361 km on the upper reaches, between Burma, Laos, and Thailand, but there are more than 100 rapids, and night travel was not possible in the past.

But, the group had decided to provide 24-hour service as trade with Southeast Asian countries has been increasing rapidly. It has put more than 100 navigation markers on the river, and is equipping its ships with advanced navigation equipment.

It now takes 20 hours to go from Guanlei in Yunnan Province to Thailand, half a day less than it took before. As a result, more than 30 ships are in the harbor daily, moving metals, machinery, and daily necessities from China, and seafood, minerals, and timber from countries along the lower reaches of the river.

Title: China: 'Roundup': Burma Strives To Develop Border Areas

Sourceline: OW2302090498 Beijing Xinhua in English 0728 GMT 23 Feb 98

Yangon, February 23 (XINHUA) -- In recent years, the Myanmar [Burma] government has been taking various measures to promote economic development and social progress in its border areas, where ethnic minorities are benefiting greatly.

In the 19 border regions including Kachin, Kokang, Wa, Kengtung, Shan, Kayah, Kayin, Mon, Rakhine and Chin, the government has been focusing its efforts towards community development, integrated and rural development, poppy plantation eradication and poppy substitute crop plantation.

The official New Light of Myanmar newspaper quoted a senior official as saying that the implementation of development projects during the period between 1989 and 1993 were encouraging, but after that it began slowing down for some time.

Work has been picking up in recent years. The government hopes to expedite the development of border areas, improvement in the living standards of ethnic minorities living there and eradication of narcotic drugs.

After the first four years of project implementation, the government laid down an 11-year master plan for the development of its border areas beginning in 1993, including the first short-term three-year plan (1993-94 to 1995-96), the first medium-term four-year plan (1996-97 to 1999-2000) and the second medium-term four-year plan (2000-01 to 2003-04). The government has spent billions of Myanmar kyats (one U.S. dollar equals about six kyats) in the past nine years on infrastructure projects, including the building of roads, bridges, dams, schools, hospitals, hydropower stations and telecommunications systems, according to official sources.

According to a recent work review of the country's Work Committee for Development of Border Areas and National Races, 50 percent of the border development-related projects have been completed.

Myanmar has been cooperating with United Nations agencies in this regard and seven projects have been or are being implemented with the involvement of the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) and the United Nations Drug Control Program (UNDCP).

The development of border areas has received a great boost since the government made peace with various anti-government armed groups. Almost all the anti-government armed groups, including 15 ethnic rebel groups and the Khun-Sa-led drug trafficking Mong Tai Army which had controlled several border areas, have made peace with the government, and they are reportedly getting involved in the development of border areas in cooperation with the government.

An example is in the Mongla region in eastern Shan state which became an opium-free zone in 1996. The government is striving to create more opium-free zones including Kokang, Wa and Monkoe.

Myanmar has also been cooperating with neighboring countries like Bangladesh, China, India, Laos, Thailand and Vietnam in fighting drug trafficking in common border areas under bilateral or multilateral agreements.

[Title: Burma: Economic Collapse 'Almost Unnoticed']

Document Date: 25 Feb 1998

Sourceline: OW2502101598 Bangkok The Nation in English 25 Feb 98 p A5

Subslug: Article by Gerald Roberts: "Trouble Ahead for Burma"

While most international attention has been concentrated on the economic crisis in Thailand, Indonesia and Korea, the economic collapse in Burma has gone almost unnoticed.

This is partly because Burma has a relatively small amount of foreign debt estimated by the World Bank to be US$5.2 billion - and so its problems would appear to have little effect on other countries.

However, the dramatic devaluation of the Burmese kyat has meant that Burma can now only purchase a fraction of the foreign goods it once did.

This has not only meant reduced exports for other Asean economies but is now also damaging China's trade in Southeast Asia as well.

On Jan 10, Chinese-Burmese trade relations hit a new low when the Burmese military junta banned all trade in "nonessential" goods with China. During the early 1990s, Burma enjoyed a mini-economic boom. Its bubble economy was financed primarily from overseas investment in such sectors as energy and tourism.

This influx of new investment was mainly the result of the ruling junta's new open-market economy system in Burma. Hundreds of millions of dollars poured into projects such as the Yadana gas pipeline and various hotels and shopping centres in Rangoon.

In addition, the junta also relaxed restrictions on foreign trade, which resulted in a huge influx of foreign imports. Burma became quickly dependent on such goods as Malaysian cooking oil and Chinese farm machinery and tools.

Foreign investors soon found out, however, that little had changed in Burma despite the proclamations of the junta. First, the market was really only open to those Burmese who had connections to the military and this severely restricted the overall economic growth of the country. Second, all types of business had to pay unofficial "fees" to various members of the Burmese junta.

"When Singaporean investors wanted to set up a new airline in Burma, they had to pay US$5 million to Gen Thein Win [Air Force] to get him to sign the agreement," says a Rangoon businessman who wished to remain anonymous.

"Also, to export rice, traders had to pay $10 per tonne to Lt Gen Myint Aung [of the Agriculture Ministry] in order to get an export permit". Moreover, political instability also adversely affected foreign investment projects, especially in the tourism sector. The junta's 1996 "Visit Myanmar Year" was by all accounts a disaster, with only about 100,000 tourists visiting Burma when one million had been predicted. The result has been that many of the larger hotels have had to slash staffing levels by over 50 per cent.

Spending Spree [Subhead]

By 1996, all these factors plus the international economic sanctions had brought new investment to a trickle. Burma's bubble economy finally burst, together with that of many other Asean countries, with the currency crisis in mid-1997.

Burma was hit especially hard, however, because of its heavy reliance on imported goods and its resulting huge trade deficit.

Also, because of Burma's spending spree on foreign goods, it had virtually no foreign currency reserves with which to protect its own currency.

According to the World Bank, Burma had less than $156 million in foreign reserves in June 1997.

When the kyat began to fall last July, the junta reacted immediately by arresting anyone caught buying or selling US dollars on the black market.

By eliminating any trade in the dollar, the junta was hoping to hold the exchange rate to 150 kyat against the dollar from its previous value of about 100 kyat.

However, in September the kyat slipped again to about 250, and by December it had sunk to 400. Again, the junta began arresting black market buyers, including Thein Htun, owner of Myanmar Pepsi Co, who was sent to Insein prison.

Apparently, some members of the junta blamed Burma's currency crisis on the lax import policies of the then trade minister Gen Tun Gyi, which they believed had led to the huge trade deficit and the collapse of the kyat. As a result, import/export policy control was moved out of the trade ministry and placed under the control of a new import/export commission chaired by Gen Maung Aye in mid-1997.

One of the first actions of the new commission was to change the system for granting import permits. Previously, importers could take foreign goods on loan and then repay later by bartering Burmese goods if possible.

The new system required importers to pay with foreign currency up front before being granted permission to import.

One result of this new system was the drastic reduction in the amount of foreign imports that required payment in dollars such as those from Malaysia and Singapore. It also led to an even greater demand for the US dollar on the black market.

At the same time as the demands for US dollars was increasing, its supply was falling, not only because of the drop in foreign investment, but also because of the sharp decline of Burma's once major export - rice. Rice has been in short supply, mainly due to mismanagement and the export debacle of 1996.

The junta had estimated a total rice harvest of about 8 million tonnes for 1996 and so made contracts to export one million tonnes to mostly Asian countries such as Indonesia.

Unfortunately, the rice harvest estimate was based on false field reports from army commanders who were afraid to displease their superiors. The result was that the junta was several hundred thousand tonnes short and had to dip heavily into rice stocks reserved for civil servants in order to meet the contract.

"Normally, the price of rice does not start to rise until June or July," said one Burmese trader, "but because there was less rice last year, rice prices were already increasing in January, and they still have yet to come down."

In order to prevent massive rice shortages, the junta is now restricting rice shipments outside of the districts in all divisions and states of Burma.

Chinese Trade Fell [Subhead]

According to several Rangoon-based businessmen, the junta was hoping that the effect of the Southeast Asian currency crisis would bypass Burma, as most of its trade was with China and involved Chinese yuan, not the US dollar.

But the value of the kyat has also fallen dramatically against the yuan. The exchange rate had been about 20 kyat per yuan for several years, but in August 1997, the kyat fell to 25 and by December it stood at 43 kyat per yuan. Not surprisingly, trade between Burma and its largest trading partner has tumbled. Although current Burma-China trade figures are not yet available, one need look no further than the main Burma-China trading gate at Muse/Ruili in China's Yunnan province to comprehend the enormous change which has taken place over the last six months.

"Before July last year, there used to be at least 200 trucks full of Chinese goods crossing this border every day," lamented a Muse-based trader. "This year there are only 30 to 40. Now all the restaurants and hotels in Muse are nearly empty."

The same trader said the economy on the Chinese side has also been hit.

"There used to be at least 2,000 Burmese living in Ruili working in restaurants, selling jade or as working as prostitutes. Now there are less than 700 left because of fewer jobs and so little money being spent by the Chinese."

Most of Burma's trade with China involves exports of agricultural products and fish products and imports of agricultural machinery, tools and electrical goods. According to a Burmese machinery importer interviewed in Ruili, trade began to decline when the kyat fell in August 1997.

"Most Burmese traders get paid in kyat for their exports and have to pay in yuan for imports. The demand for Chinese goods is still there, but we just cannot afford to buy the same amount any more."

Counterfeit Money [subhead]

Another problem which may be affecting the value of the kyat is the amount of counterfeit Burmese currency in the area. Most of the counterfeit currency is made in China, and a 500-kyat note can be purchased for as little as five yuan, less than half the price for the real Burmese currency.

"The fake kyat is no problem because the quality is so good you can hardly notice. Anyway, when we make deals, we just count the bundles of kyat because we do not have time to count every note," said an Indian-Burmese trader based in Muse.

In any case, Burmese authorities appear to be taking the problem seriously. In October 1997, they arrested a Chinese businessman in Muse attempting to pass off over 1.5 million counterfeit kyat as real currency. Burmese traders in Muse said most of the counterfeit money is sent to mining areas deep inside Burma to be used for purchasing gems and jade. The latest blow to Chinese-Burmese trade was the implementation of the junta's trade ban in January. This order banned all imports and exports at Burmese-Chinese trading gates for 26 "non-essential" goods including rice, sugar, metal, jade, teak, fruit and petrol. Businessmen based in Ruili see the ban as an attempt by the junta to shore up the value of the kyat. It is believed that if Chinese imports can be substantially reduced, the trade deficit with China can be balanced, which will lead to lower demand for yuan and thus a higher value for the kyat.

The Chinese trade ban also appears to be aimed at restricting illegal exports and shifting legal exports through trade centres in Mandalay and Rangoon. This would improve tax collection on exports and increase export prices by allowing competitive bidding by foreign businessman. Previously, many of the exports of jade and teak were shipped through areas controlled by ethnic ceasefire groups who do not pay export tax to the junta. In addition, exports to China are usually not open to competitive bidding, which allows Chinese businesses to buy Burmese products cheaply and simply re-export them for higher profits to overseas markets. The theory may be sound, but according to those in the field, implementation is another story.

"I think this ban is only temporary," said one Mandalay-based trader.

"The Burmese economy cannot survive very long without these Chinese goods. Anyway, I do not think that China will allow it to continue much longer. It is not only about selling Chinese goods in Burma, but more importantly Burma is the main transit point for Chinese goods going to Thailand, Bangladesh and India. This ban is really hurting the Chinese."

Although other countries in Southeast Asia also face severe economic difficulties, the difference in Burma is that there is still a civil war, and the junta has yet to solve the political stalemate with the opposition National League for Democracy (NLD).

Many analysts predict that as long as this political situation remains, it seems unlikely Burma can carry out the sweeping economic reforms necessary to stabilise its economy.

The priority for political reform in Burma was emphasised by an event that took place just after the currency crisis began last July. At that point, the Burmese junta had done everything it could to stop the fall of the kyat, but it was to no avail.

However, on the day when the junta announced it had held a secret meeting with some leaders of the NLD, against all economic trends and expectations the value of the kyat rose against both the dollar and the yuan.

Title: Burma: China Described as 'Friend in Need'

Document Number: FBIS-EAS-98-099

BK1004023398 Rangoon The New Light Of Myanmar in English 8 Apr 98 p 5
Subslug: Article by Sithu Nyein Aye: "Walking East While Looking North"

I, Maung Nyein Aye, could not forget the guidance laid down by Malaysian Prime Minister Dr Mahathir, who built Malaysia into the most promising "Tiger" of South-East Asia, as soon as he took office. The guidance is "Look East".

The guidance "Look East" laid down by Dr Mahathir implies Japan which at that time was top of the list of industrialized nations, and South Korea which was gathering momentum.

New Economic Policy of Malaysia, built on the guidance of Dr Mahathir, could practically encourage industrial development. For the materialization of the New Economic Policy, Industrial Master Plan (IMP) was drawn and executed nationwide.

Economic condition of Malaysia which surged in a decade ago accounted for the fact of whether the guidance "Look East" was successful or not. The Gross Domestic Product of Malaysia is 208 billion US dollars, following GDP 230 billion dollars of Saudi Arabia which is the most oil producing country in the world. There is not much difference in population between these two countries.

The GDP of Singapore, the population of which is much less than that of Malaysia, is only 75 billion dollars. Moreover, per capita income of Singapore is more than that of Malaysia. The annual export value of Malaysia amounts to 78.5 billion dollars.

Malaysia-made proton cars penetrated into European market.

As for Myanmar going through a transition to a new market-oriented economic system, some of the achievements, of Malaysia which are worthy of imitating, have to be imitated after making a careful assessment.

The fact I happened to take notice of at first is that there is a stance calling for "Don't imitate Western style" behind the new policy "Look East".

It is not strange Japan and Korea which then ranked first in business administration and diligence, are ideals to imitate for Malaysia.

I have learnt about how Japanese people work hard and strictly observe discipline since my childhood. I have also heard of the fact that even Japanese people are said to be lazy in the world and the country which works harder than Japan is Korea.

It is a correct stand that Malaysia didn't imitate Western style. So, Myanmar has to look east.

If we cast a glance at the north while looking east, the following will be found.

The Gross Domestic Product of the People's Republic of China is 3,945 billion dollars, which is feeding and caring for 1,239.5 million people equivalent to one-fifth of the present world population 5,900 million.

Next to GDP 7,575 billion dollars of the US which ranks first in the world, it stands second. The GDP of Japan, which ranks third, stands at 2,940 billion dollars.

Foreign reserves is 141.3 billion dollars, which ranks second, whereas 220.1 billion dollars of Japan stands first.

In the export sector, the export value during the last year amounted to 182.7 billion dollars. Relatively speaking, this amount is less than half of export value 411 billion dollars of Japan. However, it is more than the export value of developing countries.

According to statistics released for 1997, during this year, export and import values totalled 325.1 billion dollars. The export value exceeded the import value by about 40.3 billion dollars. Such surplus was no mean feat. In a considerable number of countries, the import value exceeds the export value.

Of export value 182.7 billion dollars of the People's Republic of China, 59.3 billion dollars were gained from the export of industrial and electronic goods.

Foreign direct investment stood at 45.3 billion dollars.

Goods with "Made in China" markings can be found in every shopping mall around the world. Chinese made products such as shirts, stocking caps, gloves, socking, trousers, warm clothing, hand bags, shoes, jewellery, radios, cassettes and televisions can be seen at various places. Why do China achieve such a desirable success? Because of hard work, they are winning success. You can get nothing by staying idle.

As it has given priority on agriculture and sufficiency in food, the country could produce 492.5 million tons of cereals, 4.3 million tons of cotton, 53.45 million tons of meat and 35.61 tons of marine products.

The West had cornered our nation for many years, making restrictions for Myanmar to face starvation and troubles.

It has imposed economic sanctions, also applying various means to stop loans and aids from central monetary firms.

Myanmars have confronted and defied all these sanctions and restrictions, depending on its own land, water and human resources.

We will never forget such conspiracies to cause starvation and troubles in Myanmar and to lead toward internal stability. These are all unforgettable acts. We feel bitterness whenever we think about internal ax-handles betraying their own nation.

China shows its goodwill toward Myanmar not only in words but in deeds, always ready to help Myanmar to stand firmly.

China has become the true friend of the Third World Countries, staying firm as the only permanent member of the United Nations Security Council, always defending the rights of developing nations at the UN.

Chinese leaders Zhou En-lai and Deng Xiaoping visited Myanmar many times and opened more ways to further cement the existing bilateral cordial relations. Leaders of Myanmar have also visited China and further developed the goodwill relations between the two.

Facilities such as Thanlyin Bridge, National Theatre and Thuwunna Youth Sports Training Centre are monuments of China-Myanmar friendly relations.

What kind of assistance did we get from the West during the last 30 years? We never got anything from them. The Dome on Pyaya Road and the Engineering College can be pointed as assistance of the West.

While the West has neglected our country bitterly, China has come out as a friend in need, proving itself the true friend of Myanmar.

Similarly, ASEAN friends showing understanding on Myanmar, repulsing all Western pressures, has fostered a brethren friendship with our nation.

As long as we have friends like these, we have no reason to be afraid of the West. We will retaliate the West's bitter ignorance on US.

The Eastern sun is rising higher and higher at the time the Western sun is setting under darkness.

Myanmar people will see the People's Republic of China which is always willing to see our betterment and which has metta and cetana [loving kindness and goodwill] on us when they look to the north while turning their back on the West and marching toward the East.

Similarly, we will see friends from the East warmly welcoming us with cordial smiles.

We Myanmar should rally our strength and work hard in building a firmer and stronger nation. We will surely succeed one day.

[Report by Pratap Chakravarty

NEW DELHI, May 3 (AFP) -- Defence Minister George Fernandes said Sunday India faced a bigger threat from China than from Pakistan and added New Delhi would make nuclear weapons if the country ran out of options.

"China is potential threat number one," the defence minister told the private Home TV network.

"The potential threat from China is greater than that from Pakistan and any person who is concerned about India's security must agree with that fact," it quoted Fernandes as saying.

His statement came hard on the heels of the first-ever visit to India by a chief of the Chinese army, General Fu Quanyou.

India, which exploded a nuclear device in 1974, fought a brief but bitter border war with China in 1962 which led to a 14-year diplomatic freeze.

India has also fought three wars with Pakistan since 1947.

Replying to questions about a supposed build-up of Chinese military around India, Fernandes said Beijing had deployed its nuclear missiles in Tibet.

"China has its nuclear weapons stockpiled in Tibet right along India's borders..."

Fernandes also said Chinese military airfields in Tibet had been extended in the last six months.

He said there was "a lot of naval activity" off the coast of Myanmar (Burma), including the construction of harbours on islands owned by Myanmar where Chinese ships could be berthed.

"And their (China's) senior officials have said that the Indian Ocean is not India's ocean. There is no doubt in my mind that China's fast-expanding navy, which will be the biggest in this part of the world, will be getting into the Indian Ocean fairly soon."

Fernandes, a firebrand socialist in India's new coalition government, also said China was training Myanmar's army and it had set up a "massive electronic surveillance establishment" on Myanmar's Coco Islands on the northern tip of India's Andaman and Nicobar islands.

"These are Burmese territory. China has taken them on loan. Already there is massive electronic surveillance establishment which the Chinese have installed and which is monitoring everything in India.

"There are moves to convert that into a major naval base which would be a direct threat to us," he said.

Sino-Indian tensions have eased following a series of high-level visits which began in 1988 but disputes over their border persists. India says China still holds 40,000 square kilometres (16,000 square miles) of its territory at Aksai Chin in Kashmir. China lays claim to a swathe of Indian territory in the far eastern state of Arunachal Pradesh. Fernandes, speaking about India's policy on China, said: "I think there is a reluctance to face the reality that China's intentions need to be questioned.

"This is where our country has made mistakes in the past. We made those mistakes in the early 1950s. We paid the price in the 1960s. And I think things have not changed."

Speaking on India's nuclear policy he said: "It is taking the inevitable next step. We have come to a point where we believe we need to make a review of the defence policy."

Fernandes, however, added India would build nuclear weapons only after a strategic review.

"If those threat perceptions are as one visualises them to be following the defence review, then you have no option," he said of India's claims of military threats from Pakistan and China.

"If the review leads us to a point where it becomes obvious it is time now to exercise the nuclear option, then we will exercise it."

India refuses to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty or the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, describing them as discriminatory between the nuclear haves and have-nots.

"When we took that position it was implied that we will have opportunities to exercise more than one option," the firebrand defence minister added.

China, which is a major supplier of chemicals used in the production of narcotics, has said it is ready to cooperate with the countries along the banks of the Mekong river to prevent the chemical which is the main ingredient of amphetamines from reaching Thailand.

Chen Lufan, head of a southeast asia study association and a narcotics specialist in Yunnan, said the Chinese administration has the policy of preventing chemicals which are the main ingredients for production of narcotics from spreading to neighboring countries along the Mekong river. Yunnan Province is in southwestern China and borders several countries on the banks of the Mekong, particularly the countries which are the world's main narcotics producers -- Laos and Burma. Because of ease of transport, narcotics producers usually order narcotics-producing chemicals from China.

Chen said: "We know that amphetamines are a big problem for Thai society and are aware that the chemical Ice [previous word rendered in English], which is the main ingredient in production of amphetamines, is manufactured in China and sent to Burma for production of amphetamines before the finished product is finally sent to Thailand. We are currently trying hard to prevent the chemical from being sent out of the country."

The chemical Ice is in crystal form and looks like ice, which is why most people call it Ice. The Chinese name of the chemical Ice is Mahuangsu, it is extracted from the grass which has the Chinese name of Mahuangcao, which grows in abundance in western China.

Mahuangcao has a medical property which is effective in treating cough and nasal discharge. The Chinese people knew of this grass for more than 1,000 years and cultivated it for its medical properties.

Tang Chialin, the narcotics specialist at the international study institute in Yunnan, said the Chinese authority enacted a law in 1996 to prohibit possession of Mahuangsu and violators of the law could be punishable by execution. He said: "The loophole in the law is that Mahuangcao is a non-poisonous herb, unlike opium which is poisonous in itself. The government cannot enact a law to prohibit cultivation of this grass. Unscrupulous gangs exploit this loophole to extract the chemical Ice from the grass.

Chen noted that the Chinese authorities often launched campaigns to arrest producers of the chemical Ice. The latest arrest was in Canton and involved a Taiwanese gang which extracted the chemical Ice for export. He said: "I told Thai narcotics officials many times that they must watch out for Taiwanese gangs because they have very good chemists who can extract narcotics from plants and produce narcotics from widely available chemicals."

Chen said China has an acute narcotics problem as well. The narcotics which is popular with consumers in China is heroin, whose production base is in Burma. The Chinese administration has tried hard with little success to seek Burma's cooperation to suppress and prevent heroin from entering China because most heroin producers in Burma are armed minority groups which are opposed to the Burmese government, such as the Wa and the Kokang.

Rangoon, 6 May (Xinhua) -- Burmese official spokesman Ramin [name as transliterated] today refuted recent irresponsible comments on Sino-Burmese relations by Indian Defense Minister Fernandes.

Ramin said: "The Indian defense minister, without any basis whatsoever, claimed that China is using Burma's Coco Islands for strategic defense purposes. Burma expresses deep regret on this."

Ramin pointed out: Burma had firmly pursued a nonalignment policy throughout the entire Cold War period. Today Burma still pursues the policy of "being friendly with all countries but forming alignment with no countries."

Ramin said: "Fabricating such a fictitious story (by the Indian side) is to cater to the appetite of some people in the international and domestic communities and to find excuses to develop nuclear weapons and expand national defense forces."

India has gathered crucial evidence of Chinese naval officials working on at least nine Myanmar naval bases and Chinese vessels visiting certain islands close to the Indian coastline to monitor signal communications. Senior Government officials said they have the specific number of PLA naval engineers and operation officers posted at the Myanmar naval bases. The discovery of this substantial Chinese military presence close to the Indian shore has come at a time when both the Chinese and Myanmar governments have flatly denied setting up a signal monitoring station at Coco Islands near the Andamans.

The new evidence of increased Chinese activity in Myanmar naval bases only strengthens India's suspicions about Beijing's intentions. Naval experts have cautioned that China might pose a long-term threat to India's maritime security.

Senior officials said the Chinese have been quietly building the pressure by sending vessels to intercept Indian signal communications.

Two such vessels had visited Munaung, Yan Ria and other islands in October and December last and January this year Munaung island falls within the Danyawaddy naval regional command.

The latest sighting of Chinese vessels was in the north-west of Munaung in March this year.

Intelligence reports reveal the following new developments at some of the Myanmar naval bases:

a) Coco Islands: There are six naval engineers and operation officers from the PLA Navy.

b) Halnggyi Islands: Four naval engineers and operation officers.
c) Kyakkame naval base: Five PLA Navy officers.
d) Margul Kyunsu naval base: Four PLA officers.
e) Tannlntharyi naval HQ: Seven naval officers.
d) Sittute naval base: Seven officers.
e) Zadet Gyi naval base: Two PLA officers.

Kunming, May 21 (Xinhua) -- The director of the Public Security Department in Yunnan Province, Jiang Pusheng, said the solution to drug problems in frontier areas in southwestern China lies in eliminating drug sources in the "Golden Triangle". Yunnan borders the "Golden Triangle", which is one of the world's major drug sources, and it has put a lot of effort into fighting drug trafficking and smuggling. From 1992 to 1997, it dealt with more than 30,000 drug cases. More than 80 percent of the heroin and about 70 percent of the opium that China seized were caught in Yunnan province. Jiang said that Yunnan's experiences of the past decade show that increased economic growth and prosperity have a positive effect on halting the growing drug menace. In recent years, Yunnan has allocated 300 million yuan (36 million US dollars) for agriculture and technical training to help farmers in the northern frontier region of Myanmar (Burma) and Laos grow cereals crops to replace the opium poppy, and that economic exchanges and development in the area can reduce the reliance on the poppy economy there. More than 20,000 hectares of farmland there have been changed from poppy raising to other crops. An official of Myanmar's Special Region 4, on the frontier of the Golden Triangle, said that China's economic reforms and opening-up have also promoted economic growth in the region, which has greatly benefited the from border tourism and trade that have added some 40 million yuan (4.8 million US dollars) per year. Under the pressure from the Chinese Government, three of the six gangs involved in the drug business in northern Myanmar have reduced their poppy-raising area. The United Nations Drug Control Program is planning to use 250 million US dollars to aid farmers in the Golden Triangle grow other crops, according to Pino Arlacchi, UN deputy secretary-general and executive director.

Arlacchi said that the international community expects farmers in the Golden Triangle to completely give up poppy raising in ten years.

Kunming, July 1 (Xinhua) -- Southwest China's Yunnan Province, which is on the border of the "Golden Triangle", has cooperated with Myanmar [Burma] and Laos in an anti-drug project, bringing some hope for the peaceful elimination of drug sources in the Golden Triangle.

The project, which began six years ago, has given help to farmers in Myanmar's Special Region 1 and Special Region 4, and in three provinces of Laos in raising cash crops, greatly reducing their dependence on the poppy economy.

A Yunnan official says that the Chinese have provided seeds, techniques, and fertilizers for the farmers and have promised to purchase their agricultural products at Chinese prices.

Police in Yunnan, which has suffered tremendously from the drug trade, worked on 6,852 drug cases last year, and confiscated 4,073 kg of heroin and "ice", and 1,132 kg of opium, or about 70 percent of the drugs seized in China.

Yunnan has continued to come down hard on drug manufacturers, traffickers, and drug addicts, but still hopes that its "green anti-drug project" will fundamentally solve the drug problem. For more than a hundred years, farmers in the Golden Triangle have relied on the poppy economy and opium sales, and, in spite of the fertile soil, many still live in extreme poverty as the profits have gone to drug lords.

By planting cash crops and cereals, however, farmers have had sufficient food and a stable income, and many have been encouraged to stop growing opium poppies.

Pino Arlacchi, deputy secretary-general and executive director of the United Nations' Drug Control Program, said in his May visit to Yunnan that China has successfully helped its neighbours to replace opium planting and that this achievement has even surpassed his expectations.

Li Hanbo, Yunnan's vice-governor, says that replacing poppies is an important link in the international anti-drug strategy because it helps maintain living standards and economic development in drug-growing regions. Because of this, the international community should provide funds and techniques for the project, he says.

In Myanmar's Special Region 4, specialists from Yunnan are helping the local government build power stations and reservoirs to further improve agricultural output and facilitate the planting of certain cash crops.

More MOUs on the exemption with the remaining ASEAN members are expected in the future.

In addition, Myanmar signed with the Philippines accords on trade, establishment of a joint commission for bilateral cooperation (JCBC), cooperation against drug trafficking and abuse, and promotion of technical cooperation in forestry and forest-industrial development, investment promotion and protection, cultural cooperation and human resources development.

Agreements were also reached with Malaysia on double taxation avoidance and prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes and income, and with Brunei on setting up a JCBC.

Chairman Than Shwe attended for the first time the Kuala Lumpur second informal summit meeting of the ASEAN last December, during which Myanmar joined in signing a MOU concerning the setting up of the ASEAN Foundation and a protocol to implement the initial package of commitments under the ASEAN framework agreements on services.

The ASEAN Foundation to promote and strengthen people-to-people contact was reportedly formally established earlier this month in Jakarta, Indonesia.

Since integration into the ASEAN, Myanmar has been working closely with other ASEAN members, forming respective committees and groups in all sectors and taking an active part in various meetings and activities of the association.

Myanmar has also attended since then a series of regional meetings relating to ASEAN Free Trade Area (AFTA) scheme, investment, agriculture, forestry, transport, drug control, education, tourism, information, environment, financial, labor and home affairs.

On these occasions, Myanmar joined in the signing of accords on regional cooperation in finance and tourism as well as the setting-up of a foundation.

Myanmar, together with Laos, is also receiving technical assistance from the grouping at the Kuala Lumpur meeting of the AFTA Council in October 1997, for the fulfillment of its obligations to the AFTA. For the establishment of AFTA, Myanmar has presented its commodities list for tariff reduction.

Also since Myanmar's joining of the ASEAN, both the association's former Secretary-General Ajit Singh and new Secretary-General Rodolfo C. Severino had respectively visited Myanmar, enhancing the country's commitments in regional affairs.

Myanmar's integration into the grouping is seen as not only an opportunity for the country in the development of its economy and trade and attraction of foreign investment, but also a challenge for it in commodity production and market competition.

An ASEAN business forum delegation, led by Ajit Singh, visited Yangon last November and explored business cooperation with Myanmar counterparts, especially in the private sector.

According to official statistics, investment in Myanmar from five ASEAN fellow member countries -- Indonesia, the Philippines, Malaysia, Singapore and Thailand -- added up to more than 3.3 billion US dollars in over 140 projects at the end of March this year, accounting for about 45 percent of the 7-billion-dollar total foreign investment.

Of the five ASEAN fellow member states, Singapore ranked the second out of the total foreign investment in Myanmar with 1.31 billion dollars in 65 projects, dominating investment in hotels and tourism, followed by Thailand (1.16 billion dollars), Malaysia (587 million dollars), Indonesia (236 million dollars) and the Philippines (6.67 million dollars).

ASEAN now groups nine Southeast Asian countries -- Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, Myanmar, Laos, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Yangon [Rangoon], July 21 (Xinhua) -- The relations between Myanmar [Burma] and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) have been developing after the country's integration into the grouping in July 1997.

Exchange of visits by state leaders of Myanmar and other ASEAN member nations since then has promoted the development of their bilateral ties.

Up to now, leaders of five other member countries including the Philippine former President Fidel Ramos, Malaysia's Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad, Singapore's Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong, Brunei's Sultan Hassanah Bolkiah and Vietnam's Deputy Prime Minister Nguyen Manh Cam have visited Myanmar.

Chairman of the Myanmar State Peace and Development Council (SPDC) Senior-General Than Shwe, SPDC Vice-Chairman General Maung Aye and First Secretary Lieutenant-General Khin Nyunt also toured the Philippines, Brunei, Vietnam and Singapore respectively.

On these occasions, Myanmar initiated with these countries memorandums of understanding (MOU) on mutual exemption of visas to each other's citizens holding diplomatic and official passports in order to facilitate the exchange of visits between officials of Myanmar and the five ASEAN fellow member countries.

More MOUs on the exemption with the remaining ASEAN members are expected in the future.

In addition, Myanmar signed with the Philippines accords on trade, establishment of a joint commission for bilateral cooperation (JCBC), cooperation against drug trafficking and abuse, and promotion of technical cooperation in forestry and forest-industrial development, investment promotion and protection, cultural cooperation and human resources development.

Title: China: Xinhua Reports on Burma's Agricultural Mechanization

Sourceline: OW0608032998 Beijing Xinhua in English 0319 GMT 06 Aug 98

Rangoon, August 6 (Xinhua) -- Myanmar [Burma] is striving for mechanization of its agriculture by encouraging farmers to widely use farm machinery and equipment in cultivation and introducing both locally-produced and imported agricultural implements for the purpose. So far, 23 model mechanized agricultural villages have been established across the country, according to an annual official report on Myanmar's financial, economic and social conditions.

The Myanmar government increased distribution of both local and foreign-made farming implements to farmers in the country in the 1997-98 fiscal year which ended in March. In use were 36,200 tractors and power tillers for a total of 6 million hectares of land, an increase of 2.7 million hectares over the previous year.

Although Myanmar has made some achievements in agricultural mechanization, the majority of its land is still cultivated with draft and cattle.

According to the report, the number of draft cattle was 3.5 million yokes in 1997-98, increasing by 83,000 yokes over a year earlier. The average cultivated area by a yoke of draft cattle was 3.07 hectares.

Myanmar gives first priority to the production of farm machinery and equipment by the country's manufacturing sector during the present five-year plan period (1996-97 to 2000-2001).

According to a promulgation of the Myanmar Ministry of Commerce in April, agricultural implements are also among the 14 first-priority goods designated for import.

Official statistics show that Myanmar's agriculture, the mainstay of its economy traditionally accounting for 35 to 40 percent of the gross domestic product and 35 percent of the export, grew by 2.9 percent in its output value in 1997-98.

The country's rice production in the fiscal year was 17.3 million tons, of which 28,300 tons were exported.

Rangoon, August 6 (Xinhua) -- Myanmar [Burma]'s private sector is playing an active role in the country's economic development, contributing 75.4 percent to the gross domestic product (GDP) in the 1997-98 fiscal year when GDP grew by 4.6 percent.

According to the Myanmar Ministry of Commerce, the private sector's export and import have been considerably boosted with its share of exports jumping from 46.3 percent in 1988-89 to 67.8 percent in fiscal 1997-98 which ended in March. Meanwhile, its share of imports rose from 40.7 percent to 71.9 percent.

The sector's investment accounted for 53 percent of the total, increasing from 5.6 billion kyats (18.6 million US dollars) in 1989-90 to 75.9 billion kyats (253 million dollars) in 1997-98.

Thanks to the private sector's active participation in economic development, Myanmar achieved an average annual growth of 7.5 percent in the last four-year plan (1992-93 to 1995-96) and a 6-percent growth in the first two years of the current five-year plan (1996-97 to 2000-2001).

Kunming, 22 August (Xinhua) -- In the coming five years, Yunnan will export $250 million's worth of mechanical products, electrical products, and technologies to Burma for building the Banlang Power Station, the biggest hydropower station in Burma. The two sides sign an agreement on cooperation a few days ago.

According to sources concerned, this is China's biggest trade cooperation project with Burma, and even with Southeast Asia as a whole. The cooperation has been carried out in the form of an export credit. The Yunnan Provincial Machines and Equipment Import and Export Company will provide Burma with a large and complete set of equipment, construction machines, power station design, and construction guidance needed for the construction of the power station.

The Banglang Power Station is located in the Madalay area in central Burma. Its installed capacity is 280,000 kw. The total investment in it is $600 million. It is the biggest hydropower project planned by Burma. The power station will mainly be used for generating electricity, but it will also be used for irrigation and flood-prevention.

Although Southeast Asia is still faced with a grim financial situation, Yunnan Province still put forward at a meeting on opening up to the outside world held at the beginning of this year that it will continue to expand exchange and cooperation with countries in Southeast Asia. Yunnan Province is close to Vietnam, Laos, and Burma, and has a boundary of more than 4,000 km. It is China's base and window to countries in Southeast Asia.

Title: China: 'Roundup': Burma Active in Foreign Relations

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-98-261

Sourceline: OW1809041898 Beijing Xinhua in English 0153 GMT 18 Sep 98

Subslug: "Roundup" by Duan Tingchang: "Burma Active in Foreign Relations"

Rangoon, September 18 (Xinhua) -- Myanmar [Burma] has been following an active and independent foreign policy in accordance with the principles of the United Nations (UN) Charter, the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence and Non-Aligned, maintaining friendly ties with all nations in the world, particularly with neighboring countries in the region. In dealing with its relations with other countries, Myanmar gives priority to the maintenance of world peace and security, mutual respects and equal rights despite differences in political and economic systems of different countries.

Up to now, Myanmar has established diplomatic ties with 72 countries in the world, opening up nearly 40 embassies and consulates-general. In the period of the State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC) (from 1988 to 1997), which was renamed the State Peace and Development Council (SPDC) in November 1997 with major reshuffle of the government cabinet, Myanmar established ties with more countries such as Peru, Venezuela, Columbia, Papua New Guinea, Brunei, Brazil, South Africa and Kenya.

In order to carry out tasks of foreign affairs on a broad scale, Myanmar formed in October 1992 the Foreign Affairs Policy Committee, headed by Lieutenant-General Khin Nyunt, first secretary of the then SLORC and the present SPDC, deliberating and coordinating important policies regarding foreign relations and overseeing their implementation.

For the past few years, Myanmar leaders have exchanged visits with those of Asian countries including Brunei, China, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

These visits brought about further enhancement of their bilateral friendly ties and trade and economic cooperation.

Myanmar, which became a UN member in April 1948, takes an active part in the UN General Assembly sessions and other conferences held by the UN in accordance with the principles contained in the UN Charter.

Myanmar became a member of the Geneva Conference on Disarmament in 1962 and acceded to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT) in 1992.

The country also acceded in the year to four Geneva Conventions of 1949 regarding humanitarian treatment in the midst of hostilities and the instruments of accession became effective in Myanmar in February 1993.

Myanmar also expanded economic contacts with foreign countries and international financial and economic organizations with which the country sought monetary aid and loans as well as technical assistance.

Various projects on education, health and agriculture are among those jointly implemented in Myanmar with aid from a number of UN agencies such as UNDP (United Nations Development Program), UNICEF (United Nations Children's Fund), WHO (World Health Organization), FAO (Food and Agriculture Organization), UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) and ESCAP (Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific).

Myanmar was one of the co-founders of the Non-Alignment Movement (NAM) established in Belgrade, Yugoslavia, in 1961. The country once suspended its participation in the movement in 1979 but resumed the activities beginning with the 10th NAM Summit in Indonesia in September 1992.

As for regional cooperation, Myanmar has also been actively participating in the activities and cooperation of some regional groupings especially the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, into which the country was integrated in July 1997.

In August the same year, Myanmar joined again a new South Asian sub-regional economic grouping, the BIMST-EC (Bangladesh, India, Myanmar, Sri Lanka and Thailand - Economic Cooperation), bordering the Bay of Bengal.

Myanmar actively cooperates with countries in the world in the fight against narcotics. So far, it has bilateral agreements on this respect with neighboring Bangladesh, China, India, Laos, Vietnam and Thailand as well as the Russian Federation.

Sub-regional cooperation in combating narcotics has also been carried out under separate agreements with China and Thailand involving the United Nations Drug Control Program (UNDCP).

For five decades since its independence, Myanmar has adhered to the UN Charter in its foreign relations, opposing neo-colonialism and hegemonism and adopting a non-interference policy. The country reiterates that "it will never interfere in the internal affairs of others and will never tolerate any outside interference".

U.S., CHINA ALLIES IN WAR ON DRUGS

HOUSTON CHRONICLE: 31 October, 1998

WASHINGTON - In a step toward joint operations to fight international crime, the United States and China have established a secret electronic surveillance post along China's border with Burma to eavesdrop on narcotics traffickers from the Golden Triangle, one of the world's biggest sources of heroin, sources say.

The U.S. government has also given China several dozen Humvee vehicles for narcotics interdiction in mountainous terrain along the Burmese border. Chinese sources also said that the United States has established a secret fund that Chinese officials can access to run the surveillance center.

The listening post, staffed by Chinese and U.S. agents near the Chinese border town of Ruili in southern Yunnan province, marks a significant step forward in a U.S. intelligence-sharing relationship with China that dates back to 1971.

It follows on the operation in the 1980s by the CIA and its Chinese counterpart of listening posts in China's far-western Xinjiang Autonomous Region to monitor Soviet nuclear weapons tests.

The 1995 opening of the Ruili post illustrates the complexities of the United States' ties with China, which can include negative as well as positive engagements.

While U.S. agents were shuttling from Washington to Ruili, Yunnan's provincial capital of Kunming, and Beijing, installing the listening post, the countries were bickering over Taiwan, an island of 21 million that China views as a renegade province.

That dispute climaxed in 1996 when China lobbed missiles over Taiwanese territory and the United States dispatched two naval battle groups to warn China that U.S. officials would not tolerate an attack on Taiwan.

However, the tremors did not affect the establishment of the listening post, Chinese sources said, adding that intelligence cooperation is insulated from what one Chinese source called "short-term" troubles in the relationship.

In fact, the Ruili listening post is only the most advanced new initiatives that U.S. intelligence and law enforcement agencies are launching with China to battle crime.

After the October 1997 summit in Washington between President Clinton and Chinese President Jiang Zemin, a liaison group for law enforcement agreed last month to draw up a list of U.S. and Chinese suspects believed to be operating in each other's countries.

Sourceline: OW0411052298 Beijing Xinhua in English 0200 GMT 04 Nov 98

Yangon [Rangoon], November 4 (Xinhua) -- The Myanmar Morning Post began publishing here Wednesday in Chinese language. This is the first time in 30 years that Myanmar [Burma] allowed a newspaper in the Chinese language to be published.

The Myanmar Morning Post will be initially published on a weekly basis with a circulation of 5,000 on every Wednesday and be distributed across Myanmar and to other countries and regions such as Singapore, Thailand, Malaysia, the United States, Britain, Canada, China's Hong Kong Special Administrative Region and Macao.

The newspaper, which is planned to increase its publication from once a week to twice or thrice a week, is made up of 16 pages containing columns of local and foreign news, economic, trade and investment information, culture and advertisements.

Before the middle of the 1960s, there were six newspapers in the Chinese language in Myanmar. They are the People's Post, the China Daily, the China Commerce Post, the New Yangon Post, the Freedom Daily and the Times.

On January 1, 1966, all the newspapers terminated their publication because the Myanmar authorities stopped issuing permits to them.

Rangoon, November 11 (Xinhua) -- The Myanmar [Burma] electric power authorities and a Chinese Yunnan company reached one more contract here Wednesday on the implementation of the Paunglaung Hydroelectric Power Project in Pyinmana, central Mandalay division of the country.

The signing ceremony of the second volume contract between the state-run Myanmar Electric Power Enterprise (MEPE) and the Yunnan Machinery and Equipment Import and Export Corporation (YMEC) of China was attended by Minister of Electric Power Major-General Tin Htut and Economic and Commercial Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy Lin Jian.

Representing their respective parties, Director-General of the MEPE U Yang Naing and President of the YMEC Lin Zai You signed the contract. According to the 10 million US dollar contract, the YMEC is to provide machinery and equipment and spare parts for construction of the underground factory.

The Chinese side will extend seller's credit, while the Myanmar side is to make advance payment of 5 percent. The term of repayment is 5 years with a grace period of 2 years.

The first volume contract of the project, which is worth 160 million dollars, was signed here in early last month, according to which the YMEC is to provide the complete set of machinery and equipment, design underground factory and direct work implementation.

The Paunglaung hydroelectric power station, with an installed capacity of 280 megawatts accounting for 28 percent of Myanmar's existing installed capacity, will mainly generate electricity and will also possess agricultural irrigation capacity.

Since 1989, the YMEC has been cooperating with Myanmar in building hydroelectric power stations and has exported to the country complete sets of related equipment for 17 small and medium stations of its kind, accounting for 94.4 percent of the country's hydroelectric power projects.

The primary agreement to buy US $ 160 million worth of machinery for the project was reached between the two enterprises here in 6 October 1998, he recounted.

Reaching of this agreement will further strengthen the existing bilateral friendship, cooperation and understanding between the two nations, he declared.

Title: Burma: Burma Looks to 'Good Friend' China To Beat Isolation

Document Number: FBIS-EAS-98-320

Document Date: 16 Nov 1998

Sourceline: BK1711023698 Hong Kong AFP in English 0134 GMT 17 Nov 98

Subslug: As of filing time, Burmese media monitored at Bangkok Bureau have not been observed to report the following

YANGON, Nov 17 (AFP) -- Pilloried by the West and disappointed with the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), Myanmar is turning to its "big brother" China for support and investment, ministers say.

"We have a good friend, the big brother is helping us," one senior minister confided to AFP in an interview.

With the West refusing to grant Myanmar vital investment because of the government's failure to recognise a 1990 election defeat, and ASEAN funding slashed by the economic crisis, officials hope China may step into the vacuum.

They warn that by ostracising the country, western nations may be prodding Myanmar towards its powerful northern neighbour, which is poised to become a 21st century superpower.

"If you are pushing from one side, naturally we will lean to the other side," said Brigadier General Maung Maung, an economics minister and secretary of the Myanmar Investment Commission.

"If you don't want us to lean to the other side don't push."

Another minister, Brigadier General D.O. Abel said Beijing had already helped Myanmar in dam construction and pointed to the growing Chinese influence in the central city of Mandalay.

"China has been very supportive of Myanmar, they come forth to help in every little way they can," he said.

A Yangon based diplomat said China may be eyeing southern ports and markets for its populous Yunnan province.

"China did step into a vacuum," especially in commercial sectors, he said, but cautioned ASEAN nations realised Myanmar's argument it was pushing for closer ties with Beijing was "basically a weak one."

"The fact is our friend in the north has its own problems," he said, adding Beijing had reportedly refused to grant balance of payments relief to Myanmar.

Ministers here play up the country's strategic importance and potential as an ally for the West, given its position between regional heavyweights India and China.

"They risk losing a lot because Myanmar has been the balancing factor all along between two big giants," said Abel.

However, should China, the West and ASEAN turn the other cheek, the government insists it can ride out the storm alone.

The doctrine of "self reliance" preached by socialist strongman Ne Win between 1962 and 1988, is rearing its head again as the economy crumbles amid high inflation and a rocky currency.

"We will go on with our objective -- if you come we can reach our objectives quicker," said Abel.

"We are not at the end of the road, some people look to tomorrow, we look to more than tomorrow."

Junta ministers admit that they would be loath to step back from the country's stated neutrality policy, under which every country is regarded as a friend but none are allies.

Historically, many Burmese have been suspicious of Chinese influence, according to some analysts and may resent the heavy Chinese presence in Mandalay.

Myanmar, which is desperate to exploit abundant oil and gas reserves, has been drained of foreign investment by the United States embargo and other punitive measures maintained by the European Union.

The government has been waging a long campaign against the National League for Democracy (NLD) of Aung San Suu Kyi, and refuses to recognise the party's 1990 election victory.

In its first year as an ASEAN member Myanmar has also been deprived of funding from its neighbours which are fighting their own battles with economic turmoil.

"It has been a real drain for them, they (Myanmar) have got nothing out of it," said another Yangon based diplomat.

Prior to the crisis half of foreign direct investment came from ASEAN members.

The first project could generate 330 million kilowatt-hours (KWHs) per year, and the second 117 million KWHs annually on completion.

Early this month, the MEPE and the Yunnan Machinery and Equipment Import and Export Corporation (YMEC) of China signed a second contract worth 10 million dollars on the implementation of the Paunglaung Hydroelectric Power Project (PHPP) in Pyinmana, central Mandalay division of the country.

The PHPP's first 160-million-dollar contract was signed here early last month. The project would have an installed capacity of 280 megawatts, accounting for 28 percent of Myanmar's existing installed capacity.

Since 1989, the YMEC has been cooperating with Myanmar in building hydroelectric power stations and has exported to the country complete sets of related equipment for 17 small and medium power stations, which make up 94.4 percent of the country's hydroelectric power projects.

Title: China: 'Roundup' Views Burma's Border Trade

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-98-331

Subslug: "Roundup" by Duan Tingchang: "Myanmar strives To Promote Border Trade"

Yangon [Rangoon], November 27 (Xinhua) -- Myanmar [Burma] has opened a total of 12 border points with neighboring countries to promote its border trade with them since the government took over the power of state in late 1988. Myanmar has border trade with China, Thailand, India and Bangladesh under bilateral agreements, carrying out trade activities at six trade points with China, four with Thailand and one each with India and Bangladesh. China is one of Myanmar's major trading partners. The two countries reached a border trade agreement in October 1988.

The inauguration of Bhamo (Lweje) border trade point of the Myanmar side in August this year brought the number of such points with China to six, and three of them are designated as state-level ones.

According to Myanmar official statistics, bilateral trade including border trade between Myanmar and China amounted to 331 million US dollars in the 1997-98 fiscal year, rising from 242 million dollars the previous year, with the balance of trade in China's favor.

Myanmar began border trade with Thailand, its other major trading partner, in March 1996 at four border points. The addition of the Thai-Myanmar Friendship Bridge on the Moei (Thaungyin) River linking border towns of Myawaddy (Myanmar) and Maesot (Thailand) in August 1997 has also facilitated bilateral border trade.

The Thai trade authorities proposed in September this year to establish a border trade coordinating agency of the two countries, and suggested it meet three times a year.

The Thai side has asked Myanmar to lift its ban on exports of such goods as gem stones, seafood and some livestock animals.

Meanwhile, the Myanmar side is considering easing its restrictions on the export of artificial flowers, seafood and fresh-water fishery products except buffaloes or cows for fear of shortages at home.

According to official statistics, bilateral trade including border trade between Myanmar and Thailand stood at 330 million dollars in the 1997-98 fiscal year, up from 289 million dollars in 1996-97. The balance of trade was in Thailand's favor.

Myanmar's trade links with India also grew after the two countries formally inaugurated border trade in April 1995. Since then, bilateral trade at the border point of Tamu (Myanmar)-Moreh (India) has grown markedly. Meanwhile, India has agreed with Myanmar in principle to open two more border trade points, while undertaking to upgrade the infrastructure facilities of Tamu-Kalemyo highway.

To promote trade with Myanmar, India held two trade exhibitions in Yangon [Rangoon] in 1995 and 1997.

Bilateral trade has registered significant growth in the past four years with Myanmar's exports to India rising from 111.9 million dollars in 1993-94 to 236.63 million dollars in 1997-98, according to Myanmar official Economic Indicators.

Myanmar's imports from India increased from 46.89 million dollars to 107 million dollars during the same period. Myanmar enjoyed a large surplus in its trade with India.

Myanmar and Bangladesh signed an agreement on border trade in May 1994, with the Maungtau (Myanmar)-Teknaf (Bangladesh) trade point formally opened in September 1995.

Bilateral trade including border trade stands at about 8 million dollars annually.

To promote its trade with Myanmar, Bangladesh held two trade fairs in Yangon in March 1995 and May 1996.

A Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) signed between the two countries' major trade organizations in July this year in Dhaka envisages trade expansion and economic cooperation.

Under the MOU, a Bangladesh-Myanmar business promotion center will be set up in the private sector to explore the possibilities of increased bilateral trade and economic cooperation, particularly the possibility of setting up a special export processing zone in the border town of Teknaf in southeast Bangladesh, exclusively for joint ventures based on raw materials from Myanmar.

Two-way trade and investment between the two countries is expected to rise to 500 million dollars in two or three years.

In November 1997, Myanmar adjusted its border trade policy to turn the trade into a normal one, using US dollars as settling accounts instead of the local currencies.

Starting February this year, Myanmar exempted the commercial tax, which was previously levied at 5 percent, cut border trade services charges to 8 percent from 10 percent and raised the rate of income tax on imported goods from 1.5 percent to 2 percent.

Myanmar's foreign trade, including border trade with neighboring countries, in 1997-98 totaled 3.24 billion dollars. The exports amounted to one billion dollars, running a trade deficit of 1.24 billion dollars.

Subslug: "Roundup" by Duan Tingchang: "Myanmar Seeks Active Role in ASEAN"

Yangon [Rangoon], December 14 (Xinhua) -- Myanmar [Burma] has been working closely with other members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) since its entry into the grouping in July 1997, trying to play an active part in the meetings and activities of the organization. In January, Myanmar attended the 7th ASEAN Tourism Forum held in Cebu, the Philippines, and joined in signing a memorandum of understanding (MOU) on regional cooperation in tourism with the aim to draw more tourists from ASEAN member countries, especially Malaysia, Singapore, and Thailand which are key tourist suppliers in the region.

Myanmar participated in the Second ASEAN Finance Ministers Meeting in Jakarta, Indonesia, in February, reaffirming its readiness to cooperate with other ASEAN member nations in solving currency and other economic issues.

In cooperation with Singapore's Hanns Seidel Foundation and the ASEAN Secretariat, Myanmar held for the first time in May a training workshop on participation in the ASEAN Framework Services Agreement to enhance the commitment of the grouping's new members.

The workshop covered topics on seven services sectors to be liberalized within the context of the ASEAN Free Trade Area (AFTA) such as services of finance, tourism, telecommunications, air and maritime transport, construction and business.

Senior finance officials of the ASEAN met in Yangon, capital of Myanmar, in July to discuss the regional currency crisis which has swept the region for over a year. Myanmar Minister of Finance and Revenue U Khin Maung Thein admitted at the meeting that the crisis has affected his country slightly, and called for cooperation with other ASEAN member countries in resolving the crisis.

In the same month, Myanmar joined in setting up a foundation in Jakarta to promote people to people contact, human resources development, education, skill training, healthcare and culture.

Later that month, Myanmar, along with other ASEAN member nations, agreed at the 5th meeting of ASEAN information ministers in Bangkok, Thailand, to launch an ASEAN satellite channel by 2000 as a step to enhance exchange of information.

The agreement also included launching a new website for culture and information.

Also in July, Myanmar joined in signing the second protocol of the Treaty of Amity and Cooperation (TAC) and the Joint Declaration on Drug-Free ASEAN at the 31st ASEAN Ministerial Meeting held in Manila, the Philippines.

At the end of July, then Myanmar Foreign Minister and Chairman of the National Commission for Environmental Affairs U Ohn Gyaw attended the ASEAN Environment Ministers Meeting in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, which was aimed at coordinating measures to deal with recurrence of forest fires and haze in the region.

Myanmar Minister of Energy Brigadier-General Lun Thi participated in the 16th ASEAN Energy Meeting held in Singapore in August to strengthen the cooperation in energy sector among ASEAN nations. The meeting called for continuing to lay natural gas pipelines and supply power according to the ASEAN Vision 2020.

Myanmar also hosted the 7th meeting of the Working Committee on Investment of ASEAN in August, which discussed the drafting of a framework agreement for the grouping's investment area, which was later presented to the meeting of ASEAN Economic Ministers held in Manila in October. Myanmar attended as observer the 19th Working Committee Meeting and the General Assembly of ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Organization (AIPO) held in Kuala Lumpur in August, during which Myanmar elaborated its adoption of a step-by-step approach in the development of the country's multi-party democratic process, and expressed its wish to become a member of the AIPO. To promote its cooperation with other ASEAN members in transport, Myanmar joined in signing an agreement on mutual recognition of commercial vehicle inspection certificates and endorsing a Framework Agreement on Cooperation in Goods and Public Services Vehicles by ASEAN member countries. The agreement, reached at the 4th ASEAN Transport Ministers Meeting held in Singapore in September, was aimed at facilitating cross-border movement of goods and vehicles.

In this respect, Myanmar has formed a Special Action Committee which involves four concerned ministries to formulate an action plan for active participation in implementing the ASEAN plan of action in the sector. Myanmar also joined in endorsing a plan for cooperation in food, agriculture and forestry at the 20th Agricultural and Forestry Ministers Meeting in Hanoi, Vietnam, in September.

In order to revive its economy hit by the ongoing Asian financial crisis, Myanmar agreed to work together with other ASEAN member nations according to a decision made at the 30th ASEAN Economic Ministers Meeting in Manila in October, endorsing the Framework Agreement on ASEAN Investment Area and the protocol on the notification of procedures in connection with the Common Effective Preferential Tariff Scheme.

To promote greater intra-ASEAN trade and mitigate the impact of the financial crisis, six ASEAN member countries including Myanmar also agreed at the meeting to use local currencies in regional trade.

The members also signed at the meeting an agreement to remove restrictions on investment to make the region more attractive to investors. Myanmar also took part in the 5th ASEAN Science and Technology Conference in Hanoi in October, which discussed science and technology related issues in the Hanoi Plan of Action with the aim of implementing the ASEAN Vision 2020.

In order to facilitate its tasks of the livestock and fisheries sector in cooperation with other ASEAN members, Myanmar formed a national-level fisheries federation in December.

After joining the ASEAN, Myanmar had attracted 3.69 billion US dollars of investment in 143 projects from five ASEAN member countries by the end of May this year, which made up 52.28 percent of the total 7.06 billion dollars of foreign investment in the country.

Title: China: Report on Investment Growth in Yunnan

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-98-351

Sourceline: OW1712083498 Beijing Xinhua in English 0729 GMT 17 Dec 98

Kunming, December 17 (Xinhua) -- While Southeast Asian countries are still struggling with the financial crisis and lack of investment, decreasing production, and falling exports, the Chinese province of Yunnan just across the border has had some of the fastest investment growth in China.

The Provincial Statistics Bureau reported today that the province has started construction of more than 3,000 new projects this year and investment in fixed assets is expected to reach 68 billion yuan, an increase 14 percentage points higher than the nation's average.

Financial support from the Central government for Yunnan amounted to 6.2 billion yuan, an increase that is just behind that for the cities of Beijing, Tianjin and Shanghai.

Yunnan borders Laos, Viet Nam and Myanmar [Burma] and is not far from Thailand. Half its exports go to Southeast Asia, which provides half Yunnan's overseas tourists.

Companies from the Republic of Korea (ROK), Thailand, and Japan account for 80 percent of the province's overseas investors. But, the financial crisis caused big decreases in Yunnan's border and processing trade from January to June, and caused the number of tourists from Southeast Asia to drop to a fifth what it was in the same period of 1996. The province's GDP from January to June grew around 7 percent. Yunnan started increasing spending on fixed assets the middle of this year to spur economic development, with 70 percent of it going to farm construction, transportation, telecommunications, urban construction and environmental protection.

Li Jiating, the province's governor, says that the increased spending is meant to boost domestic demand and reduce the impact of the Asian financial crisis and to create a good environment for the World Horticulture Fair next year.

More than 9 million people are expected at the fair, to be held in the provincial capital, Kunming from May 1 to October 31, 1999.

The provincial government has spent 10 billion yuan improving infrastructure in Kunming and a billion-yuan project at Kunming Airport will soon be completed. The terminal building is being expanded to 74,000 sq.m. to handle 10 million passengers annually.

The province has also put 8 billion yuan into highway construction to give it an improved highway network that will run to Thailand, Sichuan province in the north, Myanmar in the west, and Guizhou in the east.

Prof. Che Zhimin, deputy head of Provincial Government's Economic Research Center, says that the spending has offset the negative impact of the Asian financial crisis. Every one billion yuan in fixed assets spending will increase GDP growth by 0.6 percentage points.

Summary of Chinese Technicians' Arrival [subhead]

A Chinese technician group consisting of about 260 crewmembers arrived recently to build a highway connecting Bhamo, Burma, and Yunnan State, China. This is an implementation of the agreement between the Chinese government and the SPDC [State Peace and Development Council] last year. This project also includes establishment of ports along the Irrawaddy River. The Chinese crew entered into Burma via Lweje border route in Kachin State. The information from China-Burma border reveals that the crew will survey land for Shweli-Bhamo highway, ports and shipyards along Irrawaddy River, and in Mandalay. China has already built a railroad from Kunming, city of Yunnan State to Zingon near Bhamo, Burma. The famous highway from Shweli to Bhamo during the Second World War has also been restored.

Some geopolitical analysts predict that India is uncomfortable with China's potentiality to build highways along the Irrawaddy all the way to Minhla from which they can establish a highway to Kyaukpyu sea port via the Arakan Mountain Range near India.

Kunming, 14 Jan (Xinhua) -- The first phase of a greening and antinarcotics project, initiated by the Ministry of Science and Technology [MST] and Yunnan Province's Science and Technology Commission in cooperation with Burma, was recently completed in the fourth special zone in Burma's Shan State. Further, the project has passed the appraisal of experts and is greatly praised by the United Nations.

The fourth special zone in the eastern region of Burma's Shan State has some 74,000 residents of 13 ethnic groups. It is part of the "Golden Triangle," the world-renowned drug production base, and adjacent to Menghai County of Yunnan Province's Xishuangbanna Dai Autonomous Prefecture. Before April 1989, 262 of some 500 villages here were engaged in planting opium poppies, producing nearly 100,000 metric tonnes of opium and 600 kilograms of heroin annually. There were more than 2,000 drug addicts in the region. The grain production level was very low, and per capita unprocessed grain was less than 100 kilograms per year. It was necessary to purchase 800,000 kilograms of grain from China every year to tide over their food shortage. Because of this, the MST and Yunnan's Science and Technology Commission approved the Sino-Burmese "greening and antinarcotics project," an international science and technology cooperation program with projects such as a 1,000-mu pilot sugarcane farm and a 10,000-mu pilot farm planted with high-yield hybrid rice. The science and technology departments of Xishuangbanna Dai Autonomous Prefecture and Menghai County and other relevant departments have been responsible for the projects' specific implementation.

After the projects were started, 800 mu of sugarcane were planted in this region in 1995, and 150 mu were added in the following year. By 1998, a total of 9,000 mu of sugarcane were planted, with production expected to reach 40,000 metric tonnes. In recent years, China has provided 120,000 kilograms of hybrid rice seed, which has been planted over an area of 40,000 mu. The average output was 400 kilograms per mu, a threefold increase in output over that of the original variety of the region. The total accumulated output of 16 million kilograms has solved the problem of inadequate food in the region. Meanwhile, China has also helped Burma to develop 15,000 mu of economic crops such as rubber, tea, and fruits. The implementation of this project has basically eliminated drugs from the special region of eastern Burma. Since the region has been able to take its own measures now to eliminate drugs, UN antinarcotics inspectors, who have stationed in the region for many years, were satisfied and withdrew from the region. Meanwhile, the farmers' per capita income has been raised from less than 100 in Burmese currency during the time of opium poppy farming to 300 renminbi now. UN Under-Secretary-General Arlacchi, who is also executive director of the UN Drug Control Program, commented: "I am glad that China's assistance to Burma in substitute planting has produced such a good result." He expressed the hope that other drug-producing regions in the world would also begin to work to eliminate drugs based on this experience.

It is learned that the second-phase greening and antinarcotics project has now been discussed and approved and is being put into operation. [Description of source: Beijing Xinhua Domestic Service in Chinese -- China's official news service (New China News Agency)]

Chinese language weekly in Burma

Bangkok Post (Mailbag) -

A Chinese language weekly, the Myanmar Morning Post, has been circulating in Rangoon in the past few weeks. The financier of this Chinese newspaper is U Aik Tun of Asia Wealth Bank Group. He was born in Yunnan, China and acquired Burmese citizenship.

It is believed that the Chinese government pressured the Rangoon government to allow publication of the Chinese language weekly as one of the conditions when a $150 million hard currency loan was recently provided to the financially desperate military regime in Burma.

The registered proprietor of Myanmar Morning Post projects a circulation of 12,000 copies and the selling price is 50 kyats.

The Chinese government has now established an important precedent and any future foreign aid to Burma must also require the establishment of a free press in Burma.

We will support humanitarian aid to Burma if such foreign aid is administered directly by NLD which is the elected government of Burma.

We question the Slorc/SPDC generals' ability to administer humanitarian aid programmes in Burma. Especially since the Slorc/SPDC generals during the past few months unilaterally terminated the only American humanitarian aid programme in Burma.

In an arbitrary manner, the Slorc/SPDC generals terminated the crop substitution programme in the Kachin state administered by OSS-101 American War Veterans and financed by the US government. No reason was given for the termination of this American humanitarian aid programme.

Title: Myanmar General Notes 'Good Relationship' with PRC

Document Number: N/A

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Yangon, February 8 (Xinhua) -- The state-run New Light of Myanmar newspaper Monday carried excerpts from an interview made by the Japan Times newspaper with Brigadier General Kyaw Win, a high ranking Myanmar military official who visited Japan last month at the invitation of the Japanese government. Kyaw Win, deputy chief of the Office of Strategic Studies of Myanmar Defense Ministry and deputy director of the Defense Services Intelligence, toured Japan for nine days from January 20 to 28.

Asked about his views on the policy of sanctions on Myanmar by the United States and European industrialized countries, Kyaw Win commented that the policy is not very practical and realistic, saying that without a strong economy and basic infrastructure, transformation from one political system to another, especially from one-party socialist system into a multi-party political system, will not be possible.

On Japanese policy towards Myanmar, he praised it as a practical one, reasoning that sanctions, boycott and embargo do not help the country's transition to a democracy.

He said Myanmar does not have any specific requests to Japan which used to be one of the biggest donors in the past, believing that Japan may be able to extend assistance for education and other social sectors despite the fact that Japan cannot provide fresh official development aid to the country for various reasons.

Regarding the international accusation that the Myanmar government is involved in narcotics trafficking, he said Myanmar can challenge the world to show it evidence of its involvement, saying that "we are doing more than our share to solve the narcotics problem because we are one of few governments in the world that is doing much anti-narcotics activities without any outside assistance."

On Chinese-Myanmar ties, he said that the two countries have developed a good relationship as China is among countries that have assisted and supported Myanmar when it was facing time of difficulties from 1988 onward.

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen: At the outset, on behalf of the Union of Myanmar and the Central Committee for Drug Abuse Control, I wish to extend a most warm welcome to all the delegates and especially to those making their first visit to Myanmar, the Golden Land.

I am deeply honoured to be afforded this opportunity to address this auspicious occasion to all those present here to grapple with the problem of drugs, to exchange information and experiences on combating drugs.

The International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol) since its inception during the Second International Police Congress held in Vienna in 1923, giving birth to the International Police Commission eventually became an institution in 1956 with its own Constitution and General Regulations.

Article 2 of the Constitution stipulates the aims of the ICPO which are:- to ensure and promote the widest possible mutual assistance between all criminal police authorities within the limits of the laws existing in the different countries and in the spirit of the "Universal Declaration of Human Rights" and to establish and develop all institutions likely to contribute effectively to the prevention and suppression of ordinary law crimes.

We understand that ICPO-Interpol is an organization formed on the basis of free will, equality, non-interference in internal affairs of each country and action coordination of Police Forces with a view to combating crimes, protecting each nation's interest, contributing to maintaining security and strengthening regional and international cooperation.

These ideals, being also our aspirations, Myanmar became a member of ICPO-Interpol as of 1st January 1954 and since had been an active member attending all its annual meetings.

Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen: It is appropriate to draw your attention that the Special Session of the General Assembly held in June 1998 adopted the Political Declaration, recognizing that action against the world drug problem is a common and shared responsibility requiring an integrated and balanced approach in full conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and international law and particularly with full respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of States, no-intervention in internal affairs of States, and all human rights and fundamental freedoms.

This conference is a collaboration effort of the Government of the Union of Myanmar and the International Police Organization, and on behalf of Myanmar, I would like to go on record of our deep appreciation and gratitude to private local donors for the financial support and to Interpol for technical assistance to make this conference a reality.

In similar vein do I also wish to thank heartily, all the delegates and distinguished guests for taking out time for this important meeting.

Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen: The principal objectives of this International Heroin Conference is to facilitate the establishment of enduring contacts among the law enforcement agencies and foster considerable understanding of each other's problems and difficulties which, in the long run, strengthens the will to cooperate against illicit drugs trafficking both at the regional and international level.

Looking at the objectives we can assume this is a timely meeting and the right venue where significant changes are taking place with regard to general trends and patterns of illicit heroin production and trafficking and also for expanding the existing cooperative mechanism, an appropriate forum where all available information, experience and expertise about new trends and development could be exchanged.

In this connection, it is unfortunate that the United States, Britain and some European countries have chosen to boycott this important conference. The international drug trade is an urgent problem which needs to be addressed in a spirit of mutual cooperation by the entire world community. As two of the largest markets for heroin in the world, the United States and Britain bear a special responsibility to work with the rest of the international community in every way possible. Their huge markets fuel a global narcotics trade which threatens to affect many countries in the developing world, including Myanmar.

The Government of Myanmar regrets the US and Britain refusal to participate in this important conference and urges them to put politics aside, for the sake of the millions of people around the world whose lives are threatened by the drug trade.

I fully believe this conference will provide an excellent opportunity to openly discuss and consider strategies and solutions to the problems pertaining to international drug trafficking. Also, Myanmar is pleased to be afforded this opportunity to acquaint the international community with the work that is being carried out in Myanmar against the illicit production and trafficking of heroin.

In recent years the global spread of drug abuse has become a major international concern.

Illicit drugs are a scourge whose evil consequences transcend borders and whose threat can only be overcome with international solidarity. Myanmar shares the view that concerted effort is required at the national, regional and global level. Accordingly in parallel with our national anti-narcotic drug campaigns we have been cooperating fully with the international community to achieve a balanced approach in which illicit demand, supply and trafficking are tackled comprehensively. This conference stands testimony to the resolve of our governments to tackle this question within an international framework.

Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen: At the national level, Myanmar has adopted comprehensive plans to combat illegal drugs in line with national priorities. The problem of drugs in Myanmar is a pernicious legacy of its colonial past. Various national races of the hill regions in the border areas are engaged in poppy cultivation which is their only means of livelihood. Throughout our history until recently, these border areas remained undeveloped owing to communication difficulties. The problem was further aggravated after independence when the production of drugs and their trafficking became linked with the internal insurgency problem.

In the past, it had been our strategy to focus mainly on the destruction of poppy fields. However in 1988 we launched a new approach aimed at the social and economic development of our national races in the border areas. The key concept in the new approach is the alleviation of poverty by providing alternative income to the local populace.

Myanmar's political scenario unfolds that since 1989, 17 insurgent groups have returned to the legal fold and unprecedented peace, law and order have prevailed in the country. The State now has access to areas previously denied. The State has been able to set itself to the task of alternative and integrated rural development programmes with the twin strategy of:-

Designating drug eradication and prevention activities as a national duty and to gradually eliminate poppy cultivation by promoting the standard of living of the national races.

This augurs well for peace and solidarity and for our objective of eradicating opium in the entire country. Additionally, we have established the required mechanism, the Ministry for Border Area Development, to coordinate action against illegal drugs in all its aspects:

education, public awareness, health, agriculture, forest, livestock breeding, telecommunication, the administration of justice and social and economic development bringing to date with an expenditure of over 10 billion kyats from the State budget.

We are convinced therefore, that with the realization of these goals, the upliftment of lifestyle of the national races will be well close at hand and subsequently, the gradual elimination of poppy cultivation.

The sincere efforts of the Government has resulted in remarkable achievements and this instance may be illustrated with the establishment in April 1997 of the first Opium Free Zone in Mong La in Special Region 4 in the Eastern Shan State. As a further step, projects have been initiated for the Kokang and Wa Regions in the Northern Shan State with the year 2000 and 2005 set respectively as the target dates for the establishment of additional opium free regions.

At the same time, in order to ensure that our national efforts have maximum impact we have been cooperating with all our neighbours to harmonize our actions. This is reflected in its active cooperation in drug control activities with 5 countries in the subregion namely, China, Cambodia, Laos, Thailand and Vietnam. Furthermore, Myanmar signed bilateral agreements with India, Bangladesh, Vietnam, the Russian Federation, Laos and the Philippines to control drug trafficking.

We are confident that these cooperative efforts at the sub-regional and regional level will result not only in the effective elimination of opium cultivation and trafficking in narcotic drugs and chemicals used in the refining of heroin and the production of other illicit drugs, but also reduce the demand for consumption as well as concurrently address the problem of HIV/AIDS infection associated with intravenous drug abuse.

Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen: The full commitment of Myanmar has been proven beyond doubt by its sacrifice of many lives in its war on drugs and the resources it has spent to uplift the economic and social standards of the national races in remote border areas where poppy is grown. During the period of September 1988 to end of 1998, the Government was able to seize and destroy more than 4,125 kilos of heroin, over 28,358 kilos of opium, over 26 million tablets of Amphetamine type Stimulants, 6,239 kilos of ephedrine and over 56,832 gallons of precursor chemicals, burned down 98 heroin refining labs. Seized narcotic drugs have been put to torch in front of the public 12 times in Yangon and 19 times in the border areas.

I am pleased to inform this conference that you will have the opportunity to witness the 13th burning of seized drugs on Thursday 25th February morning before you depart for home.

But this was a result not without sacrifice. In these drug suppression endeavours, 766 members of the Myanmar Armed Forces lost their lives and 2,292 members sustained severe injuries.

We have also arranged a programme for the participants to visit the border areas in the Northern Shan State, to have a first-hand view of poppy cultivation in the Kokang region, eradication and alternative development programmes undertaken by the Government.

Here I would like to stress that all the efforts of the Myanmar Government for the suppression of narcotic drugs as well as for alternative development programmes for poppy growing areas are being carried out with our own limited resources. It is worth mentioning that every country with willing and reliable sources of financing still finds it difficult to resolve the drug problem. We, however, are determined to achieve the goal of total elimination of poppy production in Myanmar within 15 years with available resources of our own.

Nevertheless, should there be assistance from the international community, this goal will be achieved sooner rather than later. Here, we wish to emphasize and assure that we will continue our unwavering efforts with available resources till we achieve the avowed aim of becoming a country totally free of evil drugs.

Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen: In conclusion, the fight against drugs cannot be solved single-handily by one nation and hence this combat calls for international cooperation. The opium producing countries on their part, too, must strive for eradication of cultivation just as transit countries as well as consumer nations must endeavour for demand reduction and law enforcement programmes respectively with conscientious efforts. Only when all join hands and pool in resources, will this drug menace find extermination. In this connection, Myanmar will resolutely undertake its share of the global burden and solemnly pledges to continue its fullest cooperation with the international community.

Last, but not the least, let me sincerely wish all the delegates here for a pleasant stay in Myanmar.

May the deliberations here come to full fruition and success. Thank you.

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Yangon [Rangoon], Feb. 27 Kyodo -- Koichi Kato, an influential lawmaker of Japan's ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP), visited Lockkhai in Kokang state, 800 kilometers northeast of Yangon, on Saturday to inspect a Japan-aided crop substitution project he conceived.

Kokang state, bordering China in the northeast, is one of the two major poppy-growing regions in Myanmar [Burma]. Experimental farming of buckwheat over 200 acres in the northern part of the state has proved successful and cultivation is being expanded to 2,000 acres this year.

The idea of crop substitution with buckwheat was conceived by Kato when he visited Myanmar two years ago and the project is being implemented with Japanese government assistance.

Other crops under cultivation include coffee, sugar cane, soy-bean and perennials like rubber, apples, pears and walnuts.

The buckwheat seeds used in the project were originally brought from Japan. Local people are now consuming a new strain of buckwheat as an alternative staple food to rice, and China is also buying produce from the region.

Kokang state hopes that through the crop-substitution program it can completely eradicate poppy growing by the year 2000.

Kato, former LDP secretary general, arrived in Yangon for a three-day visit Friday.

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Kuala Lumpur, March 18 (Xinhua) -- China and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) have agreed to further improve and enhance their dialogue relations which they said have brought about mutual benefit.

The agreement was reached at the two-day second ASEAN-China Joint Cooperation Committee (ACJCC) meeting which concluded here Thursday. Malaysia is the current country coordinator for ASEAN-China dialogue relations.

The meeting reviewed the progress of ASEAN-China dialogue relations, particularly the implementation of projects since the first ACJCC meeting in 1997 and the prospects for future cooperation between China and ASEAN, according to a joint press statement issued at the end of the meeting.

"Both ASEAN and China agreed that their dialogue relations have brought about mutual benefit. Both agreed that there is room for further improvement and enhancement," it said.

In this regard, the meeting discussed a number of project proposals covering the areas of cooperation including human resources development, training and exchange of visits, holding of trade and investment seminars.

All projects agreed upon will be implemented under the ASEAN-China Cooperation Fund set up in 1996, the statement said.

Meanwhile, Director General of ASEAN-Malaysia Syeed Sultan Seni Pakir and Chinese Assistant Foreign Minister Wang Yi who co-chaired the meeting, expressed their satisfactions about the outcome of the meeting at a joint press conference at the end of the meeting.

Describing the meeting as "a success," Wang said that besides reaching wide consensus on the progress made in China-ASEAN dialogue relations and identifying new cooperation projects, what is more important is that the meeting further enhanced mutual understanding and trust.

Optimistic of the future of China-ASEAN cooperation, Wang stressed the need for strengthening bilateral cooperation particularly in the economic and trade fields which he said has great potentials.

Wang also stressed the need for China and ASEAN to promote cooperation in the field of science and technology to cater for the need of the information age.

About 50 senior officials from all ASEAN member countries -- Brunei, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar [Burma], the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam, and China as well as representatives from the ASEAN Secretariat in Jakarta attended the meeting.

It was decided that the third ACJCC meeting would be held in 18 to 24 months in Beijing.

- [FBIS Transcribed Text] Doi Sam Sao, Burma -- Something is cooking in Burma's northeastern frontier along the Thai border and it's more than just chemicals being boiled in one of the numerous heroin labs belonging to Burma's narcotics' trafficking groups.

For the past year or so, tension between the Burmese junta and the United Wa State Army (UWSA) has been building up, threatening to end a decade-old ceasefire agreement between Rangoon and the armed ethnic group--dubbed the world's largest armed narcotics' trafficking organisation by the United States government.

The generals in Rangoon have ordered the UWSA to move back to their stronghold in Panghsang on the Burmese border with China, so far issuing two ultimatums without specifying the consequences should the armed rebels not comply.

Naturally, the UWSA chose to ignore the demands and instead beefed up their logistics along the Thai-Burmese border opposite Chiang Mai province. At the same time, the group has begun to welcome outsiders, allowing Thai merchants to transport everything from household goods to construction materials. Twice a week, hundreds of local Thai merchants line up at the checkpoint just north of Chiang Mai's Ta Thon district to be screened by immigration and customs officers before entering what has long been a no-go area and only a couple of decades ago a place where headhunters roamed.

Border officials said thousands of Thai nationals are currently working in the Wa-controlled territory, building everything from a small dam to hospitals and schools. The checkpoint, located in Mae Ai district, was opened last August.

A road construction project--financed by both the junta and the UWSA--which will link Chiang Mai's Mae Ai district to Mong Yawn and Mong Hsat, some 90 kilometres inside Burma's Shan State, is expected to be completed this year. A loop linking Mong Hsat to the popular border town of Tachilek opposite Chiang Rai's Mae Sai district is also on the way. "They are here to stay," said Maj Gen Chamlong Photong, chief-of-staff of the Thai Army's Third Region. "The pressure is on us to do something about it."

In fact, the Thai general added, the UWSA is on the verge of becoming the next druglord of the Golden Triangle, replacing Khun Sa and his Mong Tai Army, who surrendered to the government three years ago in return for amnesty.

Thai and US drug agencies estimate that about 1,700 tonnes of raw opium were cultivated in the Triangle last year, down from 2,300 tonnes the previous year, partly because of bad weather. About 10 kilogrammes of opium is needed to make a kilogramme of heroin.

"The Wa are responsible for nearly half this amount," said Sorasit Sangprasert, deputy chief of Thailand's Office of the Narcotics Control Board.

The UWSA came into existence shortly after the Communist Party of Burma crumbled a decade ago. A ceasefire agreement, orchestrated by Burma's security chief Lt Gen Khin Nyunt, was reached soon afterwards.

The idea, say Burma watchers, was to neutralise a 20,000-plus strong army that had enough weapons to last them at least a decade. Rangoon didn't want these weapons, most of which came from China, to fall into the hands of other rebel groups.

For the Wa, it was an opportunity to expand their heroin empire from their stronghold in Panghsang to a new frontier along the upper Thai-Burmese border.

But nothing comes easy in trouble-plagued Burma. The expansion meant that a war between Wa and the Khun Sa's Mong Tai Army, the Wa's arch rival and business competitor, was inevitable.

Three years ago, Khun Sa and his army surrendered to the junta and the territory once controlled by the former opium warlord was left up for grabs as Burmese, Thai and Wa troops rushed in to plant their flag poles. A Wa commander overseeing the crossing point to Thailand said the UWSA will not make the same "mistake" as Kun Sa.

Indeed, it's a very different story nowadays. With Khun Sa and his army out of the picture, the decade-old agreement is losing its appeal as territorial control along the rugged conflict-plagued borders becomes a higher priority for certain sectors in the junta's ruling body known as the State Peace and Development Council (SPDC).

The SPDC has demanded that the UWSA retreat to the Chinese border. Essentially, this would mean that their heroin and methamphetamine network through Thai gateways would be shut.

Thai military officers, however, say the implications are too great for the Burmese to begin a war with the Wa.

"The situation makes it difficult for us," Chamlong said. "Besides, the Chinese doesn't want them along their border either."

In fact, the growing drug problem in Yunnan province forced the Chinese authorities to summon UWSA leader Pao Yochang for a stern warning. At one point, the Chinese threatened to cut off the flow of food to Wa territory.

Nevertheless, the pressure is on Thailand to do something about the flow of drugs into the Kingdom. No longer is the group producing heroin for European and American markets. Instead, narcotics officials insist, millions of methamphetamines--known locally as yaa baa--produced cheaply by the group, have flooded into Thailand.

"It's cheap to produce and the market is right here in Thailand," Sorasit said.

During a recent two-day visit to Thailand, Burmese Foreign Minister Aung Win dismissed allegations that Rangoon is to blame for the rise in the methamphetamine problem in Thailand, saying the precursor chemicals needed for producing the stimulants comes from abroad.

"Besides, how do you know the drugs are not made here (in Thailand])" he added. "They could be produced anywhere."

Burma has come up with an ambitious plan to end opium cultivation nationwide within 15 years. The plan has received praise from some in the international community. Critics say the ruling junta is too willing to appease insurgent groups as foreign condemnations take a back seat to stability in the hinterland.

"They choose to ignore the reality (in Burma)," Win Aung said.

Nevertheless, it remains to be seen if the ruling junta is willing to pick a fight with one of the world's largest producers and traffickers of illicit drugs.

Besides, the generals in Rangoon have other pressing issues to deal with, namely the dry-season offensive against armed ethnic groups who refused to sign a cease-fire agreement with the government, Chamlong said.

Meanwhile, all parties agree that it is a matter of time before the Wa and Burmese begin fighting each other again.

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Yangon, April 8 (Xinhua) -- Myanmar[Burma]-China bilateral trade reached 381.1 million US dollars in 1998, 21.56 percent more than that in 1997 which was 313.5 million dollars. The latest official figures, issued by Myanmar's Central Statistical Organization, show that the country imported 257.7 million dollars' worth of goods from China, while exporting to China commodities valued at 123.4 million dollars. Myanmar mainly imports from China capital and consumer goods including transport and electrical machinery and apparatus, while its chief exports to China cover timber, marine and agricultural products. Border trade between Myanmar and China has been playing an important role in the two countries' bilateral trade. So far, Myanmar has opened, on its side, six trade points along the border with China. In its efforts to expand the foreign trade, Myanmar exempted the 5 percent commercial tax since February 1998, lowering the border trade service charges to 8 percent from 10 percent and raising the income tax rate on imported commodities from 1.5 percent to 2 percent. khin nyunt marks peace in wa region

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Politically, and perhaps financially, the Burmese army has gained immensely from its 1989 ceasefire agreement with the United Wa State Army (UWSA). This marriage of convenience was the first peace pact between an ethnic army and the Burmese junta since the breakdown of peace talks in 1964, and served as a catalyst for truce agreements with most of the other ethnic groups.

A decade later, however, the Burmese junta is in the hot seat over its relationship with the Wa. Internationally, the regime has been candidly blamed for its association with the Wa, who have become the No. 1 drug trafficking syndicate in the world, thanks to the immunity they enjoy in return for allegiance to Rangoon. At home, the junta's uneasy alliance with the Wa is riddled with long-held mutual distrust.

The Wa had been one of the main pillars of the Burma Communist Party (BCP) prior to its collapse in early 1989. The Wa truce with the junta followed in May of that year. When the BCP was active, the Burmese army had to deploy thousands of troops on the frontier near the Chinese border to contain the communists. During the BCP's time, the Burmese army rarely launched major offensives against other armed ethnic groups along Burma's eastern border with Thailand.

After the ceasefire with the Wa, it was able to save time, energy and enormous resources. More significantly, it was able to withdraw many troops from battles in the north and re-deploy them in the eastern border areas. From late 1989, the Burmese army was able to begin an all-out war against opponents in the eastern region. The Burmese military pressure forced many ethnic groups to cease operations against Rangoon.

For the Wa, the truce provided a good opportunity for them to expand their drug activities. Shortly afterwards, the Burmese army was accused of abetting the armed group in drug trafficking. The Burmese police have no authority to search any vehicle belonging to the UWSA. No action could be taken against the Wa who had shot and wounded civilians and killed a police officer in Mandalay in 1997. The unruly behaviour by Wa officers goes unchecked by the authorities.

Because of the benefits it has gained from the truce, however shaky, the Burmese regime has paid little attention to public criticism over its pro-Wa attitude. In any event, it cannot afford to do away with the peace pact, considering the risk of going to war with the Wa group.

In fact, both the Burmese army and the Wa have gained mutually from their deal. The junta's objective is to slowly kill ethnic rebellion through ceasefire agreements. The Wa wish to reclaim their freedom.

The mutual distrust has led to cat-and-mouse games between the Burmese army and the Wa. The former has often tried to smuggle arms or despatched disguised intelligence agents into the UWSA territory. In some cases, drugs seized from the Wa by Burmese soldiers have not been returned.

The Burmese army's attitude towards the Wa officers has changed steadily over the years. The Burmese attitude that the Wa, once known as headhunters, are barbaric has now surfaced in their daily interaction.

Of several confrontations over the years, the Burmese detention of three high-ranking UWSA officers, including the deputy commander of UWSA Division 486 Aik Si, in February this year may have been the toughest test of wills. The arrest was in response to an earlier seizure of a large consignment of amphetamine tablets from a Wa Division 486 officer in Taunggyi, the capital of the Shan States. The Burmese army eventually had to release the officers to avoid armed clashes with the Wa.

To retaliate, Burmese troops seized drugs and money from the Division 486 headquarters and forcibly relocated Wa families to Mong Mau township. In response, the UN Drug Control Programme was informed by the Wa that its service is no longer needed in the Mong Ping township.

The latest Wa action has damaged the junta's efforts for international recognition for its anti-drug campaign. In a recent incident, the Burmese army detained an officer in charge of business deals for Division 486 and several other soldiers after a car chase in Mong Hsu, a gem-mining town. The latest incident occurred on March 5 when the Wa demanded that a TV relay station be removed from its territory and that Burmese engineers working on a water project be recalled.

Burmese military intelligence chief Lt Gen Khin Nyunt's planned visit to Mong Yawn is likely to defuse the confrontation and straighten out differences between the two parties. Despite its wish to check their strength, the Burmese junta is not yet ready to clash head-on with the Wa, who command the largest armed force and are unlikely to bow to the regime's threat.

The Wa are battle-hardened from their years in the BCP, and a fearsome enemy. Even Khun Sa, who once commanded some 20,000 soldiers and enormous wealth from the drug trade, was no match for the Wa. Military offensives against the Wa would be a massive drain for Burmese resources and an opportunity for other ethnic groups to exploit.

The Wa have another strong weapon. Their claims of potential support from their brethren in China, in case fighting resumes with the Burmese, is not a mere threat. The UWSA is proud of having Chinese-Wa graduates from Beijing University among its officers. They also claim to possess enough weapons to fight for 10 years.

The UWSA is also powerful financially. In 1989, it possessed nothing except a huge amount of weapons inherited from the communists. Ten years later, the Wa command an immense drug trafficking network and have earned millions of dollars. Their economic health is evident from the construction of a town in Mong Yawn, near the Thai-Burma border, reportedly costing about Bt1 billion.

The problems with the Wa are a hard nut to crack for the regime and could continue to haunt any government when the country returns to civilian rule.

As of now, the junta is globally criticised for the flow into Thailand and elsewhere of drugs produced by ethnic armies allied with Rangoon. Drug barons from Wa and other ethnic nationalities, who are wanted by Thailand and the United States, live freely in Burma. When nine Thai villagers were brutally killed near Mong Yawn, fingers were pointed at the Burmese army because of the Burmese-Wa connection.

For the UWSA, its primary struggle is for the recognition of their ethnic rights and this will continue at all costs. In the meantime, it will continue the lucrative drug business unless there is a political answer that can deliver the recognition. It will take political courage for the junta to find that answer.

MYANMAR SEEKS STABILITY IN THE HINTERLAND

THE ASIAN WALL STREET JOURNAL: 1 May, 1999 by Barry Wain
PANGHSANG, Myanmar - A decade ago, army commanders mutinied against the aging leadership of the Communist Party of Burma, the most powerful insurgent group trying to topple the government in Rangoon.

With the leaders seeking sanctuary in China, the movement fractured into four separate armies along ethnic lines. The Wa, who controlled the party's headquarters at Panghsang, agreed to a cease-fire with the government, following the example of the Kokang only days earlier.

Although nothing was put in writing, the agreements became the model for accommodation between central authorities and ethnic-based guerrillas that had been doing battle since soon after independence in 1948. Between 1989 and 1995, 17 major outfits negotiated similar deals, leaving only one, the Karen National Union, in open rebellion today.

Lt.-Gen. Khin Nyunt, Secretary 1 of the ruling State Peace and Development Council and head of military intelligence, this week visited Panghsang, in eastern Shan state on the border with China, to mark the anniversary of the revolt. He thinks the arrangements have given the country, renamed Myanmar, its best chance of national reconciliation in 50 years.

"Nobody can deny the fact that during this 10-year period, all these regions have developed with amazing speed," he tells several thousand colorfully dressed minorities who greet him. Actually, not everyone interprets events so positively. Foreign critics maintain that the military and the retired rebels are playing a sinister game.

The controversy started when the SPDC's predecessor junta shot unarmed demonstrators in Rangoon, since renamed Yangon, and seized power in 1988. Democracy activists and human rights bodies say the regime forged alliances of convenience with the insurgents, allowing them to engage in narcotics production and trafficking as long as they stopped fighting the government. Not true, say senior army officers, who insist the "understanding" is that the insurgents can keep their weapons and administer the territory they controlled at the time, provided they renounce armed struggle. The government promised a border development program and pledged not to interfere in the zones.

As for narcotics, the officers say the guerrillas were told in general terms that they would have to end their involvement in all drug-related activities. No timetable was set, they say, though it was understood that subsistence farmers traditionally growing opium would need time to find other forms of income.

I accepted a government invitation to join Lt.- Gen. Khin Nyunt's entourage and a few diplomats and other journalists on a three-day foray, by Russian-made MI-17 helicopter, to parts of former bandit territory.

The overwhelming impression is that while Yangon has made a good start, it faces a massive challenge in trying to convert the ceasefires into a permanent peace, eliminate the narcotics scourge and integrate frontier areas into the rest of the nation.

The transformation of Panghsang, center of Northern Shan State Special Region Two, is impressive. Huts in the remote mountain town have given way to two- and three-story modern shopping centers and hotels.

In the Good Health Fine Jewelry workshop, 92 uniformed men and women, trained by Thai experts, polish rubies and fit them into gold rings and earrings. Gold, rubies and jade come from mining concessions elsewhere in Myanmar, which the government has given as assistance.

Yangon also has directed to the Wa region more than 6% of the 14.66 billion kyats (about $43 million at current free-market exchange rates) that it has spent on the border development program in the past 10 years. The funds have been used to build roads, bridges, hospitals, dispensaries, schools and TV relay stations. Most business is in the hands of a general trading company, a type of cooperative in which 40,000 of the Wa region's 600,000 population have shares. Other far-flung ventures include a pig-breeding farm, a vineyard and an orchard.

Pau Yo Chan, chairman of the Wa administrative committee and identified by the U.S. as a suspect in the heroin or amphetamine trade, denies that drug money has been invested in such projects, just as he denies personal involvement. As well as using profits from mining, the region gets soft loans from China, he says.

Mong La, a border post to the Southeast and the center of Eastern Shan State Special Region Four, run by another breakaway faction of the defunct Communist Party, is more prosperous. It attracts about 500,000 Chinese tourists a year, lured by a casino, religious sites and a nature reserve.

With no need to obtain a visa, visitors pay two yuan, (about 24 U.S. cents), the only currency used in Mong La, for a day pass. They each spend an average 100 yuan, entertained by a Thai transvestite show and performing elephants, among other things. Again, the government has spent 727.1 million kyats on infrastructure, while the area exploits deposits of manganese and also receives help from nearby districts in China's Yunnan province.

Sai Lin, chairman of the region, dressed in a beige jacket with mandarin collar and matching trousers, holds hands with Lt Gen. Khin Nyunt as they approach a reception line. Also identified by Washington as a drug suspect, Mr. Sai Lin has been honored by Yangon for eliminating poppy cultivation and declaring his turf opium-free two years ago.

"I don't need to defend myself at all," he says. "I have a clear conscience." The government has every reason to be pleased that the ceasefires are holding and that it has access, however limited, to these vast swathes of the country. Stopping most of the fighting that characterized Myanmar for 45 years is a notable achievement.

Yet Yangon must tread carefully as it tries to overcome decades of suspicion and avoid any action that might rekindle violence. For instance, in an effort to build confidence, Lt-Gen Khin Nyunt leaves behind his usual heavily armed bodyguards when he goes on such excursions, demonstrating that he trusts once-implacable foes.

Pressuring the ethnic groups to abandon narcotics will require delicate diplomacy, as the SPDC moves toward its stated goal of eliminating poppy growing by 2014. For example, while the Wa claim to have cut opium output by 30% on the way to meeting their own 2005 deadline, Myanmar narcotics officials say any reduction has been insignificant.

Eventually, stability in the borderlands will depend on a satisfactory power-sharing arrangement in a new constitution being drafted since 1993. Ominously, a national convention charged with the task hasn't met for nearly three years, reportedly stuck on this very issue.

Further, the convention is being boycotted by Aung San Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy, which won an election in 1990 but wasn't allowed to take office. Although the government won't entertain the idea of talks with Ms Aung San Suu Kyi, it remains confident the insurgencies won't resume. "Everybody is fed up with fighting each other," says Col. Kyaw Thein, who was involved in the ceasefire negotiations. "They don't want to start again."

[FBIS Translated Text] [2 May, p 4] A ceremony to mark the 10th anniversary of the restoration of peace in the northern Shan State

Special Region 2 was held in the Sports Stadium of Pang Sang at 0945 on 26 April. This is the region of the Wa nationals. I saw the ceremonial proceedings in the evening newscast of the Myanmar Television Network on 27 April. I have been involved with the Wa region before and the program captivated me. The Wa region today has developed incredibly and it is completely different from the time when I was there in May and June of 1962. I was engrossed by what I was seeing on the screen. The program was showing the Wa regional scenes, the geographic terrain, the infrastructure, the mode of dress today, and the smiles and joyous looks on people's faces. The sports ground in Pang Sang runs smooth and even and the pavilion where the 10th anniversary celebrations were held looked grand.

The ceremony was attended by Lt. Gen. Khin Nyunt, chairman of the Work Committee for the Development of Border Areas and National Races and secretary-1 of the State Peace and Development Council [SPDC]; Maj. Gen. Thein Sein, commander of the Triangular Region Military Command and SPDC member; Maj. Gen. Thiha Thura Tin Aung Myint Oo, commander of the Northeast Military Command; leaders of national races headed by U Pau Yu Chan of the northern Shan State Special Region-2; the local populace; ministers; deputy ministers; ambassadors; local and foreign newsmen; Mr. Iwakura Tomomitsu, director general of Japan's Liberal Democratic Party; and invited guests. Also present were the national ethnic leaders who, together with the Wa nationals, had signed the peace pact. They were from the northern Shan State Special Regions 1, 3, 5 and 7, the eastern Shan State Special Regional 4, Kayah State Special Region 2 and Mon New State Party.

When the ceremony for the 10th anniversary of the restoration of peace in the northern Shan State Special Region 2 started, the group that led the parade was the national flag team. The march past was then followed by the log drum cultural group, multi-colored flags troupe, the Lahu cultural troupe, the garland group, the Shan Toe-Naya dance troupe, colorful balloons troupe, the athletes team, the pom-pom troupe and the dragon dance troupe. Wa nationals traditionally have log drums at their villages. The drums are used to send signals and convene or alert the people. Wa youths passionately beating the log drums were quite a sight. On that very day, inaugural ceremonies were also held for the new Pang Sang (Pang Kham) city hall, the Wa region Son Phu hydroelectric power plant and the Hong Pang Brewery. The following day on April 27, the Mong Zin livestock station of the Hong Pang Livestock Breeding and Development Co., Ltd., which belonged to the Wa nationals in Keng Tung, was also opened. They are the positive results of the ten years of a journey of peace. The region has prospered and is completely different from the Wa region that I had visited 37 years ago in 1962.

I had led a team of ten writers to the Wa region on a 2-month tour.

The Myanmar [Burma] Writers Club, the Ministry of Information and the Frontier Administration Department arranged the trip. It was a long journey, taking a day to go from Rangoon to Mandalay, a day from Mandalay to Lashio, another day from Lashio to Kunlong, and a day more for a 12-mile journey from Kunlong to Ho-pang. From Ho-pang, it was a long trek through forest and mountain trails with mules and donkeys carrying the loads. Since we were walking, we could only cover a distance of 5 to 6 miles each day. The trek was tortuous and it took us a day to go from Ho-pang to Pinlong village, one more day from Pinlong to Pan Yawng village, another day from Pang Yawng to Pang Khun camp, and a day more from Pang Khun camp to the big Mong Mao village. We trudged up mountains, pulling ourselves up with all our strength. Whenever we reached a peak, a higher mountain always lay ahead and that made us even more tired. The trip from Rangoon to the Wa region, which entailed climbing a number of mountains and crossing numerous ravines, lasted exactly 8 days. Roads those days meant grassy paths beaten down by travelers ahead of you. Wa region was quiet and peaceful then. Terrace farming on mountainsides produced agricultural crops. Small thatched huts with deeply slanted roofs provided shelter. A fire was kept burning to give warmth to the people around it. Pot after pot of water was boiled for green tea, which was prepared by putting slightly roasted tea leaves into a pot of boiling water. The serenity of the Wa region was later shattered by insurgency. Our base was at Mong Mao village and we visited the surrounding villages from there to study the culture of the Wa nationals. A big banyan tree grew on the east of Mong Mao village. It was called the Banyan of Peace. Whenever there was a dispute or an argument, it is said that the Wa nationals would go to that place, meet under that tree and peacefully resolve the dispute. To the east of the Banyan of Peace was the Loi Mu mountain and it was 8,000 feet above sea level. I saw an ancient pagoda on top of that mountain.

The Frontier Administration had its office at Mong Mao village. The region commissioner managed the office. Even though Mong Mao was designated as a big village, there weren't that many houses. It was a village where a market opened once every 5 days. On market days, vendors who came to sell their wares used the hut stalls that lined a long vacant plot of land on either side. They sold mustard greens, green tea, salt, rice, alcoholic drinks, and cloth. Alcoholic drinks are stored in earthen pots and a small bowl is used as a measure to sell the drinks. A buyer got a little over half a bowl to sample the drink before buying. I even saw some people moving from stall to stall asking for free samples and getting drunk on that. The sellers never complained, they even cheerfully looked at the person and smiled.

Opium was also sold at the market. A viss [3.6 pounds] of raw opium cost over 200 kyats only. Chinese businessmen sold general merchandise, ran gambling stalls, and bought opium. Because it was the choice of the Chinese businessmen, the silver coin and the square Tamu coin from the British colonial times were used as currencies. A silver coin fetched three Burmese kyat or 24 Tamu coins. The Chinese businessmen dominated the market because they controlled the currency exchange system, the gambling business and trade.

There was also a pharmacy where one pharmacist worked. He had to be persuaded to stay there. He played the role of doctor, nurse and pharmacist. Communication was difficult, the Wa nationals were poor and there was not the slightest trace of development when we visited the region. In 1962, we could not have expected the kind of development that we are seeing today on the 10th anniversary of the restoration of peace in the Special Region 2.

[3 May, p 4] Secretary-1 Lt. Gen. Khin Nyunt said, "This is a very auspicious day for both the Wa region and the State. It marks the 10th anniversary of the day when the whole Wa region in the northern Shan State, following its return to the legal fold after liberation from the yoke of the Burma Communist Party [BCP], started working closely with the government on regional development programs. I take this very auspicious occasion, to say that I am immensely pleased to be witnessing changes in Pang Sang and the Wa region, which unlike before, are prospering and developing. In addition, I am very happy that the friendship and solidarity with our Wa brethren have strengthened further over the past 10 years." In his return address, Pau Yu Chan also expressed his pleasure to see how his region has developed.

He said, "Some 10 years ago, on 17 April 1989, the people in the Wa region decided to enter the mainstream of international peace and development. They set goals to end direct confrontation and attain peace without fail and worked toward those objectives accordingly. This was welcomed and supported by the other national races and the government. Thanks to the care and support from the government and because of the support and efforts by the local people under the leadership of the Special Region 2 Administration in the past 10 years, we were able to liberate from war the nationals in the Wa region as well as declare war against backwardness and poverty. We are happily enjoying the fruits of those endeavors today."

The Wa region has prospered and developed and everybody is glad about it. The smiling faces of the Wa national brethren reflect that mood.

Peace and unity have opened the door to cooperation for development. During the ceremony, two groups in the march past chanted some slogans. Even though I could not make out the chants clearly, I believe they were saying something about strengthening the unity to achieve development. In his speech, the secretary-1 also spoke about how to achieve development on the basis of unity. He said, "SPDC Chairman Senior Gen. Than Shwe has given instructions that once mistrust disappears between the national races, armed struggles come to an end and peace is established in regions, efforts must be made in particular to develop the border areas and the national races so as to ensure that the union does not disintegrate, national unity is not destroyed and sovereignty of the nation is eternally perpetuated. In accordance with those instructions and to implement the objective of developing the border areas and the national races, a national-level committee headed by a government leader and a separate ministry were formed to systematically work toward those goals. This is unprecedented and evident to everyone."

The villages that we had visited before in the Wa region are now towns, and some have become township and districts. I notice that development grows in direct proportion to the growth of the border trade. When I and the other writers went on a study tour of the Wa region in May and June of 1962, heavy downpours made our return trip more tortuous and difficult. Today, roads are proliferating in the region like strands of a spider web. Before, we had to cross the streams and rivers by raft hooked up with pulleys and winches, and even had to wade across some of them. Today, bridges have already been constructed. There are a total of 493 miles of new roads in the Wa region: some unpaved earth roads, some built with rocks and some tarred. Renovation and maintenance work is also being done on 788 miles of old roads. There are 8 new main bridges, including the Tar Kaw-et steel suspension bridge, and 42 smaller ones, five hospitals, seven dispensaries, 45 primary schools, 3 middle schools, 3 television relay stations, 3 agricultural stations, 3 nurseries for reforestation, 3 livestock breeding farms, and 4 medical treatment centers. The state spent 16.65263 billion kyat for the overall border area development program, of which 908.74 million kyat went to the Wa region.

Imperialists of the olden days let the people at the border grow opium for a living. Today, the neo-imperialists are letting the old poppy plantations grow in the Golden Triangle border areas and bringing in modern heroin refining equipment, chemicals and methodologies to prop up the opium-dealing Koumintang and opium trafficking kingpins. The criminal gangs from western countries and western journalists, diplomats, military personnel, politicians and elected representatives are frequently going in and out of the camps belonging to the opium kingpins in the Golden Triangle not only to engage in the opium business but also in politics. The people of Myanmar are slowing trying to clear up the pile of opium mess left behind by the imperialists. People are being educated to grow the other agricultural crops instead of poppy.

Wa national leader U Pau Yu Chan made his comments about the eradication of opium at the ceremony to mark the 10th anniversary of the restoration of peace in the northern Shan State Special Region 2. He said, "Narcotics are a common enemy to humankind, and the fight to eradicate opium is therefore a historic, noble task. Since 1990, we have been working under the motto: 'Reduce opium cultivation every year, and bring an end to it eventually.' Acting accordingly, we have been able to reduce the cultivated opium acreage by 30 percent over the past 10 years. By 2005, we will be able to solemnly declare to the world that the Wa region has become an opium free zone." U Pau Yu Chan made that pledge on behalf of the Wa region, and added, "In the coming months and years, we will be flying high the banner of national reconciliation under the leadership of the government, and, together with the other fellow brethren organizations, we will strive to build peace in the country and friendship with neighboring countries. In the same way as we nurture a beautiful garden, we will nurture the Union into a modern and developed nation."

To mark the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the restoration of peace in the northern Shan State Special Region 2, the SPDC Secretary-1 handed over to U Pau Yu Chan 20 tractors, 1,080 bags of fertilizer, a fire engine and a garbage truck.

Also on the morning of 27 April, a grand ceremony was held in the sports stadium of Mong La to mark the 10th anniversary of the restoration of peace in the eastern Shan State Special Region 4 as well as to commemorate the 2d anniversary of the declaration of an opium free zone in the region. The opium free zone in eastern Shan State Special Region 4 was declared at a function held in Mong La at 0900 on 22 April 1997 and a museum was inaugurated to mark the event. I, together with a team of journalists were there to cover the event. Today, the region has remained opium free for 2 years already. Mong La was already a bustling town when I went there in 1997. We drove from Keng Tung to Mong La but the road was still under construction then and it took us the whole day by the old road. The road was not much more than an unpaved earthen road then and rain delayed our journey. Today, 20 km of the road has been paved. I watched the Mong La 10th anniversary celebrations on television also. There were many new developments compared to 2 years ago. At the ceremony, the State presented 20 million kyat for the school building project at the Mong La High School and 50 million kyat for the Keng Tung-Mong La road expansion project. A foundation was also laid at a ceremony held on the same day for the new gems showroom. A digital automatic phone exchange was also opened. The state was seen presenting some farming machinery to mark the 10th anniversary of the restoration of peace in the region.

On the occasion, SPDC secretary-1 said the region was developing fast because of peace. He noted the important role played by eastern Shan State in the trade with neighboring countries; praised the efforts made by the Mong La Region nationality leaders and the local populace which enabled the region to be declared as an opium free zone to the world; pointed out the blatant intervention by some powerful nations to break up countries and the military invasion and violation of sovereignty in some other nations; and noted the need for all the national races in Myanmar to unite and uphold the Union spirit and to achieve development.

U Sai Lin, Special Region 4 nationality leader, stated that he and the others gradually understood the futility of the BCP policies and therefore struggled free from its yoke and worked together with the government to develop the Mong La region. He said the region had seen peace in the past 10 years and been freed from opium for 2 years. He noted that there had been successes and all-round developments in the region and pledged to work together with the government in the interests of the State and the region. Wa and Mong La regions will remain peaceful and prosperous, and that is a certainty.

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Rangoon, May 15 (Xinhua) -- Resident foreign journalists in Myanmar [Burma] Saturday condemned the US-led NATO's missile attack on the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade on May 7.

U Sein Win of Kyodo of Japan, who is also honorary president of the Foreign Correspondents Club, said in an interview with Xinhua, "The NATO's acts violated the UN Charter and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations as well as the basic norms governing international relations and infringed on Chinese sovereignty."

He pointed out that the NATO attack on the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade was "deliberate," adding that the NATO wanted to sound China out and see how China would react.

He stressed that following the disintegration of the Soviet Union, the United States becomes the sole superpower in the world which pursues and practices hegemonism and power politics globally.

In recent years, China's comprehensive national strength increased obviously, he noted, pointing out that the United States does not want to see the emergence of a strong China, thus taking a preemptive strategy on China.

In another interview with Xinhua, U Khin Maung Myint of NHK of Japan said a majority of the Myanmar people believe in Buddhism which calls for "accumulation of the good for morals," believing that "good will be rewarded with good and evil with evil."

Other foreign correspondents of Myanmar citizenship such as U Hla Htway of Antara of Indonesia, U Zaw Than of Jiji of Japan and U Nyunt Tin of Fuji TV of Japan also expressed their condemnation of the NATO attack.

Title: Official: Burma Completes Military Buildup

Subslug: As of filing time, Burmese media monitored at Bangkok Bureau have not been observed to report the following [FBIS Transcribed Text] YANGON, May 19 (AFP) -- Myanmar's military build-up over the past decade has threatened to change Asia's strategic balance but junta officials here said Yangon's arms spending had fallen dramatically in the past two years.

Myanmar's arms purchases have slowed to a trickle and most military expenditure now was focused on consolidating the regime's grip on former ethnic rebel territory, officials said.

They also dismissed widely reported claims that China is developing spy posts and naval bases in Myanmar waters.

"We have been portrayed as a very dangerous race of people but before we purchased all this equipment we were one of the most poorly equipped countries in the world," junta spokesman Lieutenant Colonel Hla Min said.

He said Myanmar's military had been in desperate need of updating during the early 1990s when conflicts with a range of ethnic insurgents were at their peak and drug lords ruled swathes of territory along the border with Thailand.

But peace deals with most of the rebels and the surrender in 1996 of drug lord Khun Sa meant the military now had no need for new weapons.

"Khun Sa had an army of 20,000 men and weapons that we had only read about in magazines," he said. "All the weapons we bought were only for self-defence. We have no long-range bombers, submarines or aircraft carriers."

Myanmar is estimated to have poured about 40 percent of central government expenditure into the military throughout the 1990s, while much of its population is still without basic education or health care.

Annual defence expenditure at least doubled from 1988 to 1996, analysts say, giving Myanmar possibly the largest army in Southeast Asia in terms of enlisted troops.

Most of the weapons and ammunition came overland from China, but other sources included Pakistan, Yugoslavia, Singapore, North Korea, Russia and Israel, they said.

The "tatmadaw", as the military is known here, was updated with new jet fighters, helicopters, tanks and even battleships, giving the navy ocean-going vessels for the first time. Pakistan and China also reportedly supplied military advisors and communications gear.

The build-up, coupled with Yangon's renewed ties with China which had for years supported communist rebels in Myanmar, rang alarm bells across Southeast Asia and particularly in India, China's South Asian rival.

One Yangon-based foreign analyst of Myanmar's military told AFP last week that China had built what was broadly assumed to be a listening post on Coco Island in the Bay of Bengal, and possibly others on nearby islands.

"There is a facility there (on Coco Island) with a very tall mast and a strange concrete structure. It's close to one of India's missile testing grounds and it seems to be some sort of surveillance facility," he said.

"India does not perceive any threat from Myanmar but they do watch with some concern what China is up to. If the military relationship leads to an increase in the Chinese presence in this country then India will be under a lot of pressure."

The analyst, who did not want to be named, said China's strategic objectives in Myanmar seemed to be firmly set on gaining access to the Indian Ocean for trade rather than military reasons.

Beijing and Yangon were in the middle of negotiations over the construction of a road linking China's undeveloped Yunnan province with the most northern point at which Myanmar's Irrawaddy River becomes navigable to deep-sea ships, he said.

Hla Min acknowledged that India and Southeast Asia were getting edgy over China's designs, but assured them Myanmar would not become a "proxy" or "client" state to Beijing. "There is some concern in Asia that we are getting too close with China," Hla Min said, adding that Myanmar would never let "foreign troops" on its soil. "But if it is true (that China is building military facilities in southern Myanmar), in today's world with all the spy satellites everyone should know what is happening there."

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Ministers from the six Mekong countries and the United Nations drug agency yesterday signed an agreement in Vientiane to cooperate in drug suppression across borders.

The agreement addresses a very sensitive area of cooperation between Burma, Cambodia, China, Laos, Thailand and Vietnam.

Most have little or no control over their extensive border areas, where drug trafficking is most active. Reasons differ from country to country and are both domestic and external in nature.

The agreement is for four years and will be implemented in two phases.

The first involves China, Laos, Burma and Vietnam; the second the Cambodia-Thailand, Cambodia-Vietnam, Laos-highland, Laos-Vietnam and Burma-Thailand borders.

The cost of implementation is $1.8 million.

According to a UNDCP statement, activities under the agreement are mainly aimed at building national and bilateral cooperation, and enabling cross-border personnel to work as a team.

Key components will be workshops to build trust and confidence, and structures which favour close liaison. Enforcement activities conducive to practical and daily collaboration will also be identified and encouraged, it added.

Title: Thailand's Mekong River Pier, Lao Road Project Reported

Document Number: FBIS-EAS-1999-0604

Document Date: 03 Jun 1999

Sourceline: BK0406080299 Bangkok Krungthep Thurakit in Thai 3 Jun 99 p 19

Subslug: Unattributed report

[FBIS Translated Text] Chiang Rai -- Anan Laothammathat, president of the Chamber of Commerce of Chiang Rai Province, told Krungthep Thurakit that at present the Economic Development Project in the Quadrangle Area along the common borders of Laos, China, Burma, and Thailand has been continually promoted by both the Thai Government and private sectors. Anan said he believed that the project will materialize in the near future. However, it appears that there is a delay in the support expected from certain government agencies. As a result, Thailand may lose a good opportunity to become the main gateway in the project. At present, our neighbors, such as Burma and the Lao People's Democratic Republic, are trying to make progress on the project in many aspects.

Anan pointed out that it is important that the Thai Government urgently build a new pier in the Mekong River in Chiang Saen District, Chiang Rai Province. The old pier in the district was heavily damaged in a recent natural calamity and has not been repaired yet to meet the requirements stipulated in the project's master plan. The pier is supposed to be used as a link for waterways transportation with our neighboring countries.

The damage to the old pier has become a hindrance to the development of a transportation network between Thailand and other countries using the Mekong River as a trade route in the quadrangle. A lack of a functional pier in the district has become an important factor for investors in making decision whether to move into the district or not to engage in trading. Even though the Cabinet has already approved a carry-over budget of 260 million baht for fiscal 1999-2002 for a new fully-equipped pier in the district, no progress has been made so far to carry out the construction. It is believed that the construction blueprint is still being considered by various concerned government agencies. If it is possible, the project should be expeditiously implemented so that the new pier can facilitate the growing tourism in the region, especially along the Mekong River. The president of the Chamber of Commerce of Chiang Rai Province stressed that Thailand has built many piers and roads along the Mekong River long before any other neighboring countries. However, at present these facilities are not fully functional and able to serve their original purposes.

Meanwhile, the Lao People's Democratic Republic is reportedly stepping up efforts to continually develop transport routes within the country. With 200-million baht assistance from OPEC countries, the Lao Government has hired the Ital-Thai Company to construct a 50-kilometer long road along the banks of the Mekong River from Houai Sai to Ton Pheung Districts and to subsequently extend it to Meuang Mom District. In addition, the Lao Government also plans to promote Meuang Mom as a regional waterway transportation hub by building a pier and warehouses to accommodate waterway transport activities with other neighboring countries.

The president of the Chiang Rai Provincial Chamber of Commerce noted that the Lao Government plans to persuade the neighboring countries in the quadruple area to store their goods and to use the storage facilities at the Meuang Mom pier in the Lao Province of Bokeo. As a consequence, the pier in Chiang Saen District, if ever built at all, will be less competitive to the Lao facilities.

"Nevertheless, in mid-June, a delegation from the Chiang Rai Provincial Chamber of Commerce will visit Bokeo Province to meet the provincial governor. The delegation will ask him about the progress of the construction of the transport network in the province to link Thailand, Laos, and China, especially the delay in the construction of a road from Houai Sai in Luang Namtha Province to the Chinese border.

After definite facts are learned, the Chiang Rai trade council will take steps to encourage all parties concerned to proceed with the implementation of the quadrangle area development project as scheduled."

ASIAN WALL STREET JOURNAL: MUSE IS NOT MODEL

26 June, 1999

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Your June 15 front-page article "What Recession? Town in Myanmar Finds Muse in Commerce" about a booming frontier town at the Sino-Burma border confirms what many Burmese fear: the virtual colonization of their country by their big neighbor up north. On the surface the article reads like a free-market success story. The details, however, showing China's overwhelming influence and virtual monopoly of this tiny Burmese town, are more chilling.

A young Rangoonite makes three times a civil servant's monthly pay in one day. Muse's electricity comes from China, as do the day-laborers building a huge commercial complex -- for Chinese merchants. The toll road concession belongs to a company founded by a convicted drug lord. You tell us that the "bar, brothels and nightclubs" are all in Ruili, a few minutes walk over the China border. You don't say, but we can assume, that the brothels are staffed by desperately poor young ethnic Burmese girls and service Burmese truck drivers.

Finally, no mention is made of this frontier town as an AIDS laboratory. Burma's HIV infection-growth rate is as out of control as Central Africa's, and the fastest spread of the disease is from border towns like Muse, helped by new highways and fast money. You also do not mention the resentment felt in many Burmese hearts when they see such "booms" propelled by non-Burmese. It's not only Muse -- some people call Mandalay a suburb of Yunnan.

Title: AFP: 125 Drug Traffickers Executed in Yunnan

Document Number: FBIS-CHI-1999-0628

Subslug: As of filing time, PRC media monitored at Okinawa Bureau have not been observed to report the following [FBIS Transcribed Text] BEIJING, June 28 (AFP) - At least 125 drug traffickers, including one Pakistani and two Myanmar nationals, have been executed in China in a massive crackdown on drug related crimes, official sources said Monday.

The two Myanmar nationals were executed Friday in Kunming, capital of southwest Yunnan province, which borders on the "Golden Triangle" region of Myanmar, Laos and Thailand, a provincial official told AFP.

The two men were found guilty of drug smuggling and handed the death sentence by the Yunnan Provincial Intermediate Court along with seven Chinese traffickers, including one woman, a court spokesman said.

On Thursday, a Pakistani man was executed in the capital of the northwest Xinjiang autonomous region, an official with the Urumqi Intermediate People's Court said.

The man, who was convicted of smuggling nearly 200 grams (seven ounces) of heroin and 260 grams (9.1 ounces) of opium, was put to death on the same day as five Chinese in the same city.

Dozens of others were executed for drug related crimes across the country at the end of last week.

The crackdown coincided with International Narcotics Control Day on June 26, an occasion which gives way to numerous executions in China each year, including 100 in 1997 and 250 in 1996.

Last year no executions were reported by the official media, but June 26 fell just one day after US President Bill Clinton arrived in China for an official visit that focused largely on human rights issues.

While China does not publish official statistics on executions, media outlets have reported a total of 39 executions Thursday and 32 on Friday across the country.

Newspapers on Monday also said that 17 traffickers had been executed in southern Guangdong province, eight in southern Guangxi, 14 in southeastern Fujian and six in southwestern Sichuan province.

China is facing a growing problem with drug abuse, with state seizures of heroin rising 34 percent to 7.3 tonnes last year. Ice and marijuana seizures rose 20 and 137 percent respectively to a total of 1.6 tonnes and 5.1 tonnes.

By last year China had 596,000 registered drug users, an increase of nine percent over the end of 1997.

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Since a long time ago, there have been cordial and friendly relations between Myanmar and the People's Republic of China, with frequent exchange of visits of the leaders of both nations. Over the past 10 years, the two nations have enhanced relations in the economic field.

For promotion of bilateral economic cooperation, Myanmar formed the Leading Committee for Promotion of Economic Cooperation between the Union of Myanmar and the People's Republic of China after the State visit of Head of State Senior General Than Shwe to China in 1996.

Recently, with three objectives, namely to strengthen the existing friendship, to further promote mutually beneficial economic cooperation, and to study at first hand the advances made by China in national development endeavours, a Myanmar goodwill delegation headed by Secretary-1 of the State Peace and Development Council Lt-Gen Khin Nyunt, at the invitation of State Councillor of the People's Republic of China Mr Luo Gan, paid an official goodwill visit to China from 7 to 11 June.

During the visit, Secretary-1 Lt-Gen Khin Nyunt had cordial discussions with them on implementation of the tasks under the bilateral economic cooperation programmes and tasks to be extended, and Deputy Prime Minister Lt-Gen Tin Hla and ministers who were accompanying him had meetings with respective ministries and companies of the host country.

In connection with the visit, Secretary-1 Lt-Gen Khin Nyunt who is Chairman of the Leading Committee, said at the third coordination meeting of the Leading Committee held the other day, that all the discussions in China were successful as they were held with constructive approach and understanding. He also said coordination should be made on ministry-wise tasks which must be implemented by the collective efforts of all the ministries concerned, adding that systematic arrangements should be made for speedy implementation of the plans. It is believed that the peoples of both nations will enjoy fruits of interchanges through promotion of economic cooperation between the two nations in the near future.

[FBIS Translated Text] While a narcotic suppression drive has been intensively carried out by Thai authorities from the military, the Border Patrol Police, and Office of the Narcotics Control Board [ONCE] in all areas adjacent to the Doi Sam Sao mountain in northeastern Burma, an atmosphere of uneasiness is also simmering in the region. However, fears arising from such an atmosphere are not greater than those from the heroin producing factories operated by groups of drug traffickers in the area.

Over the past year, high tension has continually prevailed in the region thanks to confrontation between the Burmese Army and the Red Wa rebels since the 10-year truce agreement between the two sides is nearing its expiration, thereby turning this area into the most dangerous and explosive locality in this region and the armed forces of the two warring sides the largest well-armed units of the most notorious transnational drug traffickers in the world.

In the recent past, high-level authorities of the Burmese government in Rangoon issued warnings to the Red Wa Army on two occasions to withdraw from the area and move back to their former stronghold in Pang Sang town near the Chinese-Burmese border. But the warnings have fallen on deaf ears. If the Red Wa Army have refused to comply with the Burmese government's warnings, what will happen in the area in the near future? Certainly, many ethnic minority groups opposing the Burmese military government and operating in the region, including the Red Wa, do not pay much heed to the warnings, either. It is now clear that in addition to refusing to comply to the Burmese warnings to move back to their former stronghold, the Red Wa Army have now proceeded to reinforce their positions along the Thai-Burmese border opposite Thailand's Chiang Mai Province.

In the meantime, the Red Wa have also opened the door to welcome outsiders to pay visits to their territory. They have allowed Thai traders to transport goods, such as food items, essential goods, and construction materials, into their territory every two weeks for selling there. Local Thai traders have to pass through a check-point north of Thaton precinct with their goods to be inspected by local immigration and customs officers before being allowed into the Red Wa territory which was once a prohibited area for outsiders (because it was regarded some 20 years ago as the territory of the Red Wa head hunters).

A border patrol policeman said that at present thousands of Thai construction workers are working in the territory under the control of the Red Wa, building small artificial levees, hospitals, and schools which are located very near to a border check-point post in Mae Ai District, scheduled to be opened in August this year.

As for the construction of a road network in the area, the Red Wa have received some construction funds from the Burmese government and those accumulated by the Red Wa Army themselves. This road will link Mae Ai District in Chiang Mai Province with Muang Sat and Muang Yon which are located some 90 kilometers from Shan State. At present, a ring road is being built to link Muang Sat and Muang Yon in Thachilek Province, a Burmese border town located opposite Mae Sat District in Chiang Ran Province.

"The Red Wa have been determined to settle down in this area. Their presence has put great political pressure on Thailand. That is why Thailand must find a way out of this no-win situation. However, financial gains made from the Red Wa's presence also outweigh other concerns. Even the Burmese government authorities themselves do not want to fight with them. It can be said that their presence is good for the Burmese government," a Thai official familiar with the situation in the region pointed out once.

But in reality, it can be said that the Red Wa have now replaced Khan Sa and his Mong Tai Army as the drug kingpin of the Golden Triangle.

"The Thai and US drug suppression authorities once estimated that approximately 1,700 metric tons of raw opium were harvested in the Golden Triangle in 1998, a decrease from 2,300 metric tons harvested in 1997.

The reduction of the opium harvest in the Golden Triangle was attributed to bad weather throughout the year. There was reportedly a lot of rain last year," said the same Thai official. He pointed out that 10 kilograms of raw opium could be processed into one kilogram of heroin. Half of the opium harvested in the Golden Triangle was in the possession of the Red Wa.

"As a matter of fact, the Red Wa Army were established shortly after the disintegration of the communist movement in Burma. A truce was subsequently signed with the Burmese government following a successful negotiation with the Burmese government delegation led by Lt. Gen. Khin Nyunt, head of the security office of the Burmese government. A Burmese observer even said that the truce agreement was reached between the Burmese government and the Red Wa Army because the Burmese government wanted to reduce tension with the Red Wa, which are composed of 20,000 armed men possessing enough weapons to fight for at least one more decade. In addition, the Burmese government does not want these weapons to fall into the hands of other ethnic minority groups fighting against the Burmese government."

A high-ranking Thai official said that the Red Wa will find it difficult to expand the territory for carrying out drug trafficking from Pang Sang town to the upper areas of the Thai-Burmese border where many ethnic conflicts are currently brewing. The expansion of the drug trafficking operating territory by the Red Wa will certainly lead to a war and be met with fierce resistance from the Mong Tai Army of Khan SA, their arch rival in drug trafficking businesses at the moment.

"Three years ago, Khan Sa surrendered to the Burmese government, thus creating a vacuum of power in half of the territory the former drug kingpin used to control. This region formerly controlled by Khan Sa has now become a big bone of contention for many parties, including the Karen, Burmese, Red Wa, and Thai groups."

A top commander of the Red Wa Army unit assigned to take control of the check-point entering Thailand expressed confidence that the Red Wa organization will not commit a similar mistake as made by Khun Sa. He said the situation in the region has now completely changed and Khan Sa plays no role in this area any longer. Therefore, the 10-year [truce] agreement has become meaningless because all the troubled areas in the territory are now under the control of either the Red Wa Army and other groups under the umbrella of the Burmese military government's State Peace and Development Council [SPDC].

In the meantime, the SPDC has also called on the Red Wa to withdraw from the territory and retreat back to their former stronghold in China. If the demand was met, the route for shipping amphetamine pills and heroin into Thailand would be altered. However, the question is that whether the Burmese demand will be met or not.

A Thai official added that China itself does not want the Red Wa to return to their former stronghold. China even held negotiation with Pao Yohang, a leading Red Wa element, requesting that the Red Wa Army refrain from going too close to the Chinese border. If they fail to comply with the Chinese request, China threatens to cut off logistic and food support to the Red Wa Army.

"Thailand is now put under much pressure with regard to the passage of narcotic drugs through the Kingdom. A recent report said that the processing of heroin destined for the European and US Markets has now changed its pattern. Amphetamines and some stimulants are produced and marketed by certain groups of traffickers in Thailand," an ONCB official said. He also said that the products produced and shipped through Thailand are in high demand in foreign markets.

In early February this year, Burmese Foreign Minister Aung Win denied an allegation that the Rangoon government is the root cause of drug problems in Thailand. He also said that the primary chemicals used for processing drugs are [smuggled into Burma] from foreign countries. "How do you know that these drugs are not produced in Thailand? Drugs can be produced anywhere. The Burmese government has mapped out a plan to suppress and completely eradicate poppy cultivation in the country within 15 years. Our plan has been well received by many foreign countries," said the Burmese foreign minister during his recent visit to Thailand. Foreign observers said that the Burmese government is more than willing to please foreign drug suppression organizations because foreign denunciation [of its links to drug traffickers] has severely affected the security of this backward land.

"They choose to ignore the reality in Burma. It is doubtful whether the Burmese military government is willing to fight against the largest group of drug traffickers in the world or not."

Beside worrying about the Red Wa group, high-ranking Burmese military officers are also greatly concerned with confrontation and fighting with certain ethnic minority groups which have refused to sign cease-fire agreements with Rangoon for a long time.

"What is taking place along the Thai-Burmese border is an explosion waiting to happen. The Red Wa are creating their own kingdom with a strong military force armed with a great number of weapons. Burma does not want the Red Wa to do that while China does not want the Red Wa to return to their stronghold to create trouble along its border, either. It is like a time bomb waiting to explode. It is like a simmering fire burning quietly. No matter what happens, Thailand only stands to lose besides having already been used as a transport route for narcotic drugs at the moment" stressed a high ranking drug suppression official of Thailand.

Title: On ASEAN's Economic Recovery, Expansion

Subslug: By Li Bian: "ASEAN is Rising From Difficulty"

[FBIS Transcribed Text] The sixth ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF) will be held in late July in Singapore. Foreign ministers or other representatives of the 10 members of ASEAN, including Cambodia, which joined the organization recently, along with the 10 dialogue partners, including China, the United States, Russia and Japan, and observer countries will attend. The forum will focus on regional and international issues and its future development. This is the first ARF since the establishment of "Grand ASEAN." Since it is held at the recovery period of the ASEAN economy, it is attracting great attention.

Economic Recovery [subhead]

Southeast Asia was once an area with the most rapidly developing economy. Since 1997, when the most severe financial crisis took place, however, Southeast Asian countries have been struggling with economic recession. In 1998, the gross domestic product (GDP) of the entire ASEAN region decreased by 6.9 percent. Indonesia, Thailand and Malaysia, in particular, respectively saw drops of 13.7, 8.0 and 6.2 percent, unprecedented since the founding of ASEAN.

Now, the economy has hit bottom. The recovery period has begun, which can be seen from the stability or slight rise in each country's currency value and recovery of their stock markets. Also, the economy of Indonesia, which suffered the most in the Asian financial crisis, has begun to see positive economic growth again.

Experts predicted the recovery period of ASEAN economy could be divided into three stages.

The first stage is the cessation of economic decline, which will be realized by the end of 1999.

The second stage is an upturn, which will start next year, when ASEAN countries will begin to record low growth. The aim is to turn zero growth into 4 to 5 percent growth. Due to the bad economic situation of Europe and Japan, and overheated stock market of the United States, some international capital has begun seeking opportunities in Southeast Asia again. The most important impetus to economic recovery is exports. Fresh inputs of foreign capital and the expansive financial policies of local governments have not only encouraged a revival of exports but also supported the recovery of imports. At the same time, the large-scale currency devaluation undertaken at an earlier stage has boosted exports. This period is expected to last for three years.

The third stage is the high-speed economic growth. The whole growth rate will reach over 6 percent. During this period, ASEAN currencies may strengthen.

Since ASEAN countries had no effective group safeguarding measures, Indonesia and Thailand had to resort to international organizations and foreign governments. Learning many lessons from the financial crisis, they successfully held the first vice-finance ministerial meeting and the gathering of central bank vice-presidents in the East Asian area. Meanwhile, the process of financial system reform and the establishment of the ASEAN free trade Area (AFTA) were accelerated and their internal cooperation strengthened. As a result, the economic environment within these countries is turning good.

Indonesia has launched a profound reform of its financial system and its politics have become stable. Therefore, investor confidence has been restored. According to the Asian Development Bank, if the Indonesian economy stopped shrinking in 1999, its growth rate would increase to 2 percent in 2000.

With the aid of the International Monetary Fund, the Thai economy had moved onto a steady development road by the end of 1998. Zero or weak growth may be realized in 1999. By 2000, the growth rate will reach 2.5 percent.

Since Malaysia introduced foreign exchange controls, its economy has become temporarily stable. The GDP growth rate may be 0.7 to 1 percent in 1999, and go up to 2.7 percent in 2000.

Due to its good economic foundations and great development potential, ASEAN countries will have optimistic prospects if they can achieve a stable political situation and proper external conditions.

Enhancement of Members [subhead]

During the Cold War period, two superpowers confronted each other, and ASEAN expansion seemed impossible. Entering the 1990s, with the end of the Cold War and the political solution of Cambodia's problems, the confrontation between ASEAN and Indochina countries (including Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia) also disappeared, which paved the way for ASEAN expansion. In the meantime, the rapid development of world regional economic cooperation imposed a great challenge for ASEAN's economic development and cooperation.

While strengthening and deepening economic cooperation, ASEAN, employing its advantageous geographical, cultural, and historical conditions, expanded to cover the entire Southeast Asia. In 1995, Vietnam became the seventh member of the ASEAN; and Myanmar [Burma] and Laos respectively became its eighth and ninth member in 1997, just before its 30th anniversary. On April 30, 1999, Cambodia became its 10th member, thus the "Grand ASEAN" was finally formed. This has become a milestone in the development of the organization.

The formation of "Grand ASEAN" has far-reaching influence on the peace and stability of Southeast Asia and the Asia-Pacific region.

Politically, "Grand ASEAN" enables the organization to participate in international affairs and has a positive effect on the world in regards to multi-polarization. Also, "Grand ASEAN" emphasizes its "oriental" feature, abides by self-dependence and opposes Western countries' interference in its internal affairs on the excuse of "human rights" and "democracy."

For instance, it shook off the pressure from the West in solving Myanmar's internal issues. Cooperation on the basis of equality and consultation will be promoted. The ASEAN principles of equality and mutual benefit and consultation have been identified and applied in the economic and security cooperation in the Asia-Pacific region and will play a role in coordinating and solving regional conflicts.

"Grand ASEAN" is also beneficial to the security of Southeast Asia. After accepting Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia and Myanmar, ASEAN has the ability to solve complicated disputes and problems in bilateral relations. As a result, ASEAN has a wider group coordinating function in Southeast Asia, thereby reducing the "interference" of Western countries and promoting the peace and stability of Southeast Asia. ASEAN expansion means Southeast Asian problems have become the internal affairs of the ASEAN organization. On the other hand, ASEAN becomes more concerned with factors outside the region and is ready to take action any time.

In economy, Grand ASEAN helps regional economic cooperation. In the 1980s, a world regional and group economy developed, and ASEAN actively participated in economic cooperation while quickening the building of AFTA. With the extension in population, area and economic scale, it also saw an expansion in its economic scale, internal market capacity and need. This led to a change not only in the economic relationship among ASEAN members, but also in its external economic links and structure. Grand ASEAN will provide more opportunities to the regional economic development and cooperation.

People must see that ASEAN expansion is a process of adjustment. Because of differences in political situation, social systems and economic levels, the ASEAN members could not expand their organization and function synchronously. Time for regulation is needed. In addition, a country's crisis usually develops into a regional crisis, which weakens the strength of ASEAN to some degree.

- [FBIS Translated Text] Regional News Center -- China and Burma are the major supporters which enable the Wa to become a major narcotics production center. The Wa, the Chinese, and the Burmese have shared their benefits well. China helps by allowing transit of narcotics through its territory to Hong Kong and Taiwan. It provides fund for the Wa's education, communications, and agriculture development in exchange for the Wa allowing Chinese access through its southern territory to the sea. Thailand's fuzzy border policy makes it an unwitting united front of Wa activities, as evidenced by the unwillingness of Chiang Mai provincial authority to close the border crossing point at San Ton Du which the Thai private sector uses to trade with the Wa. The provincial authority claims that closure will affect relations with Burma, while the Thai military wants it permanently closed.

Colonel Phithiphon Musikanan, deputy director the Chiang Mai branch of the Internal Security Operations Command who has been assigned by the Chiang Mai governor to oversee security along the border, told Phuchatkan that the Third Army Region had recommended to the National Security Council [NSC] to close the temporary border crossing point at San Ton Du in Tha Ton subdistrict, Mae Ai District, Chiang Mai because the Wa has exploited it to launder narcotics revenues and smuggle narcotics. The NSC forwarded the recommendation to the Chiang Mai provincial authority which is in charge of management of the border crossing point.

The provincial authority considered the recommendation last month and concluded that the border crossing point would be kept open on grounds of good relations with Burma. The crossing point has been kept open despite violations of the regulations by the Thai private sector which is permitted to export goods through it. The violations include export of prohibited products. The exporters were given official warning; future violations would result in revocation of their export permits. To comply with the military's wish, more strict controls have been imposed on use of the border crossing point.

The San Ton Du temporary crossing point is less than 100 km from Mong Yon and Mong Sat, the main Wa communities, and constitutes the closest point by which goods can reach the Wa stronghold. The Chiang Mai provincial authority's decision to keep the crossing point open contradicts the wish of Lieutenant General Sommai Wichawon, Third Army Region commander, who urged during some interviews that it be closed permanently.

The NSC's consideration of the Third Army Region's recommendation concluded that the provincial administration should implement the NSC policy of strengthening relations with the neighboring country and prudent management of the border problems which may arise. This NSC position challenges its own emphasis against the Wa's narcotics problem, particularly its amphetamine production.

The Thai military wants the San Ton Du crossing point closed to transit of goods to curtail the Wa's growth as drug producer. The Wa smuggles some 200 million baht worth of amphetamines to sell in Thailand annually. In addition, selling goods to the Wa and sending Thai workers to work for them contributes to Wa's laundering of its narcotics revenues.

Competition by exporters using San Ton Du border crossing point [subhead]
Members of the Thai private sector have competed to export goods through San Ton Du border crossing point and their ensuing disputes have led to the parties involved to accuse each other of using falsified documents to apply for export license.

On 12 October 1998, the Chiang Mai provincial authority revoked the export license of Phukha Engravings Limited Partnership on ground of exporting other products outside that allowed by its oil export license.

A competitor of Phukha Engravings accused to the provincial authority that the latter used falsified documents. The ensuing arguments led the provincial authority to grant export license to five other companies, increasing the number of companies holding export licenses to seven. At that time, Phukha Engravings representative, Sunet Praiwan, claimed that her company's trading partner held a license issued by the Burmese government, while her competitor did not and its status no more than a local import-export company. If the agreement between the Thai and Burmese Commerce Ministries made during the Chawalit Yongchaiyut administration's term is used as guideline, several exporters may be illegal because they probably did not register with the Burmese government and their trading partners in Burma did not have licenses. Support from Burma, China [subhead]

It is clear that the Red Wa's growth, reflected by its construction of a new town opposite the Thai border and development of its army, is funded by its narcotics revenues. It also receives direct support of the Burmese government, including in the area of trade as companies must hold licenses issued by the Burmese Commerce Ministry. The growth is also contributed by indirect support of the Thai and Chinese governments. The three Wei brothers--Wei Hsueh Kang, Wei Hsueh Long, and Wei Hsueh Yin--are former Kuomintang members. They are now Red Wa military leaders and the brains behind the Wa narcotics operations. The Kuomintang were originally supporters of the Chinese nationalists but later switched to support the Chinese Communist Party and the pro-Chinese Burma to defeat the Kuomintang. This explains the Wei brothers' connection with China. The three brothers used their connections with China to build a network to transport narcotics through Yunan to China's east coast and on to Hong Kong, Taiwan, and the west. The narcotics transport activities encounter virtually no meaningful obstruction from the Chinese government. By cooperating with the Burmese military government to destroy the Mong Tai Army of Khun Sa, the Wa received in return the right to self rule and narcotics operations. The revenues from the Wa narcotics operation in Myawadi are split 30 percent for the Burmese government, 30 percent for the DKBA [Democratic Karen Buddhist Army], and 40 percent for the Wa themselves.

The Burmese government also provides military support to the Wa and allows Wa troop movement in the areas under government control. In 10 years after the United Wa State Army [UWSA] was established, it has built up an army of some 20,000 soldiers and established an armed force "to safeguard peace and sovereignty over land, sea, and air in the special zone 2." The principle of the Wa army is: "No one will be allowed to commit an act of aggression against us; we will not commit aggression against anyone. If anyone wages aggression against us, we will retaliate."

There are clear evidence of the support of the Chinese and Burmese governments for the Wa, or the so-called special administrative zone 2 of the Burmese federation, particularly in the development of Wa cities and the life of the Wa people.

Since early 1998, the Wa have begun to make business investments by themselves, using narcotics revenues, as well as with the Burmese to bring progress to its territory. It receives assistance from the Burmese government in education, industrial, medical, and public health development, as well as in highway construction. The Burmese government also allows the Wa to trade precious stones and jade and gives it special privileges to build a trade center in Rangoon and operate steel industry in several major Burmese cities.

The Burmese government uses 3 million yuan from the Chinese aid to build "Wa Chenzing nationalities school" which now has some 400 students and 30 teachers. It teaches Chinese as the main language and Burmese and English as secondary languages. It also teaches agriculture and other vocational courses. The Burmese government also subsidizes an elementary school in the southern part of the Wa territory which currently has about 1,000 students.

The Chinese government built a television station in Pang Sang, the Wa capital north of the Golden Triangle, in June 1995. The Chinese television station in China's Sumao city extends cooperation to the Wa station by sending signals in MMDS format.

The UWSA uses its soldiers to aid people in agriculture in the military zone 171. The agriculture center in Ban Hong in southern part of Wa territory planted some 3,000 longan trees in 5 years as well as some 1 million teak trees. The independent regiment in Mong Yon built new irrigation canals to aid cultivation of 50 rai of rice. The regiment 214 used its soldiers to operate a big cattle farm in Pang Sang. The artillery and independent regiments planted some 5,000 rubber trees.

Lychee and cashew nut trees and tea plants were cultivated 5 years ago by the independent regiment, in addition to coffee and sipolan plants in the agriculture center west of Pang Sang. The fund for economic cooperation in Sumao city, China, donated sipolan plants to be planted in the Golden Triangle; some 350 plants were already grown.

In communication, the Wa regards road repair and construction as its first development priority, having built some 3,000 km of laterite roads and 90 percent of foundation have been completed for some 730 km of other roads. Some 19 bridges were built in Hua Tao, Kang, Jong, Long Kui, and Pan Sing, each costing more than 500,000 yuan. A hydroelectric dam was built by Chinese engineers on Nam Toeng river and began operations on 24 September 1998. The Kun Ma hydroelectric dam began operations on 28 November 1998. The 40-meter high Sung Fu hydroelectric dam was completed early this year and generated 7,500 kilowatts of electricity.

China and Taiwan aid Wa business networks [subhead]

The Wa established a joint trade development company in Lashio, near the Chinese border in December 1996 and opened company branches in Rangoon, Mandalay, Keng Tung, Thachilek, and other cities to run jade and precious stone business. It also opened similar offices in Su, Phakang, and Kut towns.

The companies set up by the Wa included: Hong Pang, Yi Sing, To Kang, Kang Lu, Kang Jiang, Fo Ya, Wa Oil Refinery, Sing Mai Jing Fong Hotel, Pang Sang Water, Kang Lo, Wa Nationality Bank, Sun Yin Tobacco Industry, and Tang Yan Ruby. Some 5,000 people are employed by these business operations.

A company from China's Hainan province invested some 3 million yuan to establish a joint venture in Wa territory to produce some 30,000 military uniforms annually for UWSA soldiers. It also invested 500,000 yuan to set up a computerized plant to print official materials in Chinese, English, Burmese, Wa, and Shan languages, as well as text books.

The Wa has established close relations with the Chinese government, particularly in Yunan. It attended meetings on China-Burma border activities which discussed suppression of smuggling as well as economic development.

The Wa leaders have close ties with senior Chinese officials as the result of past Chinese assistance to the Wa while it was part of the Communist Party of Burma. The Chinese government has reportedly sold weapons worth a total of over $1,400 million to the Wa and is developing network of roads from China to the mouth of Irawadi river to gain access to the Andaman Sea. The current Wa narcotics operations under leadership of Wei Hsueh Kang also receive Chinese support. The support from China also includes communications, education, and agriculture. Taiwan also provides support for the Wa, as Kuomitang remnants and their families still live and earn a living in Wa territory.

While Thailand has carried out intense suppression of amphetamine smuggling into its territory, the Wa has been able to exploit the loopholes to use its narcotics revenues to buy Thai goods and hire Thai workers for its development activities. This amounts to Thailand giving indirect support to the Wa to launder its narcotics revenues.

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Yangon [Rangoon], July 16 (XINHUA) -- A spokesman for the Myanmar State Peace and Development Council said that Taiwan is part of China and that Myanmar [Burma] will always pursue the "one China" policy.

Lieutenant-Colonel Hla Min made the remarks Thursday evening at the Japanese Self Defense Forces Day ceremony when giving his comment on Lee Teng-hui's recent separatist remarks on cross-Straits relations.

Hla Min stressed that China is Myanmar's good neighbor, and Myanmar's existing policy is to strengthen and develop friendship and cooperation between the two countries.

The Myanmar government will stick to the "one China" stand as before, he added.

Press Release

YANGON, 17 July - The following is the full text of the Press Release issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs today:

With regard to the recent statement by Lee Teng-hui on the cross-Straits relations, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has issued the following Press Release.

The Union of Myanmar was one of the first countries which recognized the People's Republic of China when it was founded on 1st October 1949. Since then, Myanmar and China have been able to establish kinsfolk-like pauk-phaw friendship based on the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence. As a close friend of China, Myanmar reiterates its full support to China's efforts to safeguard its sovereignty, dignity and territorial integrity.

Moreover, Myanmar consistently abides by the "One China Policy" and recognizes Taiwan as an inalienable part of the People's Republic of China. "The New Light of Myanmar" (Internet version) 99-07-17

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Yangon, July 18 (XINHUA) -- Overseas Chinese and Chinese-Myanmar [Burma] residing in Yangon held a forum at the Chinese Embassy here Sunday, strongly condemning Li Tenghui's recent separatist remarks over cross-Straits relations.

Attended the forum were more than 50 representatives from 17 overseas Chinese (OC) associations in Yangon including the OC Chamber of Commerce, associations of Fujian Natives, Yunnan Natives and Guangdong Natives. The attendees pointed out at the forum that Li's separatist remarks are bound to end with failure.

The forum adopted a joint statement as follows:

Li Tenghui claimed in an interview on July 9 by a German media that Taipei now regards the ties between the two sides of the Taiwan Strait as "matters between two states" or "at least a special state-to-state matter" between them.

Li's separatist remarks have barely exposed his consistent and deliberate plot to divide China's territory and sovereignty, and create "Two Chinas", "One China, One Taiwan" and "Taiwan Independence".

Li's remarks are, in essence, to vainly attempt breaking up Taiwan from China and its crucial point is to negate the principle of One China.

As is known to all that there is only one China in the world and Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory and sovereignty.

Reunification of motherland is a sacred aim that nationalities of the whole world pursue. Chinese nationality is a great nationality who founded the world's most long-standing unified country.

Reunification of motherland is one of the most important standard norms of value of an ancient civilized China.

Any remarks and acts, aimed at splitting, refusal of reunification and creating obstacles over relations between the two sides of the strait, is a betrayal to the country and nationality. It will be strongly opposed by the Chinese people, including the Taiwan compatriots.

Any plot challenging against the principle of One China, creating "Two Chinas", "One China, One Taiwan" and "Taiwan Independence" is doomed to failure. Any people attempting to split the motherland will be cast aside by the history and will become a culprit of the nationality.

Myanmar imports from China mainly machinery and spare parts and consumer goods, while exports timber and marine products to China.

With six trading points already opened along its border with China, border trade plays an important role in the bilateral trade.

Title: Surayut: 'Development Aid' for Wa Best Way To Fight Drugs

Document Number: FBIS-EAS-1999-0816

Subslug: Report by Veera Prateepchaikul, Nusara Thaitawat, Subin Khuenkaew, and Wassana Nanuam

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Development aid for Mong Yawn and the southern military command of the United Wa State Army (UWSA) in Burma's Shan State is the best strategy against drug trafficking by the group, the army chief said.

Gen Surayud Chulanont said in an interview with the Bangkok Post that both Thailand and Burma, which he referred to as "neighbour", had agreed on this point.

"Both our neighbour and us agree that to provide alternative development to the ethnic Wa was the best solution at this time to enable the people to have other means of living," he said.

The army chief said the government was exploring the idea of approaching the United Nations International Drug Control Programme (UNDCP) or a private organisation to come in and help the ethnic Wa.

The commander said he was not directly involved.

The United Wa State Party, the political arm of the UWSA which was formed in 1989 following the breakup of the Burma Communist Party of which the ethnic Wa were a dominant faction, had appealed for international development aid in 1993.

But letters of appeal, submitted to the UN and major aid donors were mostly ignored because of the international boycott of the Burmese military rulers in Rangoon. The UNDCP responded but faced much difficulty in raising funds for an alternative development project in Ho Tao, in the south of the UWSP's northern territory on the Chinese border, launched only last year.

But funding aside, the project which involves the governments of China and Burma, the Wa leadership and the UNDCP could serve as an example for Mong Yawn, located some 30km from the Thai border in Mae Ai district, Chiang Mai.

A private group based in Chiang Mai has already completed a "need assessment" paper for Mong Yawn.

Gen Surayud's remarks follow tough military action against the UWSA drug traffickers over the past month.

The 20-day operation involving 800 soldiers along a 50km stretch of the border classified as most sensitive in Chiang Mai and Chiang Rai, and which ended on July 31, had significantly destroyed the UWSA's network in the two provinces.

The suppression drive was prompted by the brutal killing of nine Thai villagers who accidentally stumbled on a Wa drug caravan.

Other operations involving smaller army units have been launched to keep up the pressure on the UWSA.

The San Ton Du temporary border crossing in Mae Ai was officially closed last week. Gen Surayud said he was not aware of any reaction from Burma, but that the official channel would be the Foreign Ministry.

"We want to send a signal to the UWSA that they can no longer do as they please," said Gen Surayud. "We want to make it most difficult for them," he said, of the result of the closure of San Ton Du.

While no drugs have been found at the San Ton Du border crossing, its closure was intended to disrupt the UWSA's massive infrastructure projects in Mong Yawn, believed to be funded by its drugs trade in Thailand. The projects include a hydro-electric dam being built under the supervision of Chinese engineers from Yunnan, electricity and water supplies, and housing for over 10,000 people.

Land was being cleared for agriculture and animal husbandry, and also to settle more people being relocated from UWSA's northern territory. The UWSP is headquartered in Panghsang near the Shan-Yunnan border.

An estimated 6,000 Thai workers are being employed by the UWSA to build its infrastructure in Mong Yawn and the UWSA southern military command which stretches from Mong Yawn to Mong Hsat.

Gen Surayud said that the army still believes that the Kiew Pa Wok temporary border crossing in Chiang Dao district, some 40km from San Ton Du should be closed as well because it also leads to Mong Yawn. The army had made the recommendation to the Defence Ministry together with San Ton Du but was rejected.

General Surayud said the anti-drug suppression was funded by the army's budget without any financial aid from the government because it thought drug scourge was a security threat.

But if the fund proved inadequate, he said the army would ask for more budget from the government.

Kachin report

NORTHERN IRRAWADDY PORT DREAM STILL IN THE CARDS

BurmaNews - BC: August 18, 1999 (based on NLM and MIC reports, Courier files)

BHAMO -- Burma's military junta is keeping alive a plan to develop a container port suitable for international traffic on the northern reaches of the Irrawaddy River near Bhamo.

The site for the projected port, about 32 kms downstream from Bhamo, was visited by SPDC First Secretary Khin Nyunt in his rounds of the Kachin state last weekend. Located near the riverside village of Sinkham, the port would be accessible from Mandalay and Mogok to the south, from Bhamo and Myitkyina to the north and eastwards from China along routes leading from the border towns of Museh and Lweje.

Conflicting figures in an official bulletin suggested that a wharf capable of handling three 500 ton vessels at a time would be constructed at Sinkham. A container yard capable of handling 320,000 tons of cargo a year would be built alongside the wharf.

A much discussed plan for transporting goods from Yunnan province in China would have them moving from Sinkham down the Irrawaddy to Min Hla in Magwe and from there overland by a route yet to be developed to a projected deep-sea port on the Bay of Bengal at Kyauphyu.

The Bhamo - Myitkyina route has been the target of major bridge construction projects. Last November a steel-frame bridge 2700 feet long across the Irrawaddy was inaugurated just south of Myitkyina. A concrete-reinforced Bailey bridge was opened over the weekend at Maliyan in Waingmaw township. Three other bridges are currently under construction along the 175 km highway. When completed travel time between the two major towns in the state will be cut in half.

In a major address at the Maliyan bridge opening Khin Nyunt said the Kachins, the Tais and the Burmans had stuck together through thick and thin for a thousand years, especially when there was danger of "alien aggression". The "divide and rule" policy of the "colonialists" had failed, he noted, and with it "their plot designed to sow discord" with its "evil legacy".

Earlier in his tour of the northern state, the SPDC's First Secretary visited a land reclamation project in the Dunban-naungmi area of Hpakan township. It was tough going, U Htin Aung, manager of the Golden Green Co, reported to the general. The company has a concession of 5,500 acres of land for development, but so far only 600 acres have been reclaimed and of that only 240 acres have been planted with monsoon paddy in the current crop year. However Golden Green is aiming to sow a thousand acres with mustard soon.

Official head hunters of the Military Intelligence Service (MIS) were able to report to the intelligence chief that the very thought that he might visit Hpakant township had moved 323 members of the National League for Democracy branches there to resign from the opposition party "of their own volition" just days before his arrival. In Myitkyina, 166 NLD members submitted letters of resignation prior to the general's visit. An NLD member who fled to China recently estimated that there were only 30 party members left in the state.

0817-01 New Highway Bridge Promotes Border Trade

A 320-feet long Maliyan Bridge was built at a cost of over US $ 0.15 Million. The bridge was inaugurated last August 15.

The reinforced concrete Bailey bridge lies on the Bhamo-Myitkyina Highway. This will serve for the smooth transportation of goods between the northern provincial capital of Myitkyina (nearly 1100 Km north of Yangon) and Bhamo, a major commercial town near the Chinese border.

This northern highway is touted to be crucial for border trade between Myanmar and the Yunnan province of China.

[FBIS Translated Text] Regional News Center -- Hong Pang Import-Export is reportedly the center for money laundering by the Wa group under command of Wei Hsueh Kang, the new narcotics kingpin. Ta Fa and Madame Yai are the two Wei lieutenants who control Hong Pang operations. A well-known kamnan [subdistrict chief] in Mae Sai District supports Hong Pang operations and provides Thai telephone connections used by Hong Pang Company. Two businessmen from the Thai side of the border are regular customers of Hong Pang Company.

The Wa group has enriched itself from amphetamine trafficking in Thailand and has turned to operate legitimate businesses to launder its narcotics money. Hong Pang Import and Export Company Limited [Hong Pang] has become the center of its open businesses.

According to a report from Chiang Rai Province, Hong Pang has its office in Thachilek, which is opposite Mae Sai District, Chiang Rai Province. The office is located on the Thachilek-Kengtung road, about 3-4 km from the bridge across the Sai river which serves as the permanent Thai-Burmese border crossing point.

Hong Pang's manager is Ta Fa, who is reputed to be a major business brain of Wei Hsueh Kang, commander of the UWSA [United Wa State Army] regiment 361 who has become a leading world drug kingpin after Khun Sa surrendered himself to the Burmese government in 1996.

The report noted that the last place that Thai police authorities traced Surachai Ngoenthongfu to was Hong Pang. Surachai, or Bang Ron, was part of Wei's drug network before he fled to Burma to escape arrest.

Earlier, Suphot (family name unknown), who coordinates Wei's foreign businesses, admitted during a meeting with Police Colonel Phanurat, in his attempt to clarify accusations about Wei's and the UWSA narcotics trafficking activities, that "Madame Yai," or Yuphin, provided assistance to Bang Ron to flee to Burma. A report notes that Yuphin is Ta Fa's wife, while another report says she is a Hong Pang manager.

A report says Hong Pang currently uses the telephone which is connected to the Thai telephone system in Mae Sai District. The telephone number is 053-731... Fongnuan (family name withheld) of Mae Sai subdistrict reportedly applied for the telephone number from the Telephone Organization of Thailand and extended the cable across the river for use by Hong Pang. Fongnuan works for "kamnan S." who is a very influential person in Mae Sai District.

Hong Pang serves as a "holding company" for Wei's business network in Thachilek, which conducts trade in precious stones, agricultural products, chemical fertilizer, smuggled goods from China and Thailand, slaughter house, as well as import and export business, among others. It has a large warehouse in 2 rai of land on the Thachilek-Kengtung road opposite A-kon market. The warehouse reportedly stores all kinds of goods and some members of the Wa army could be stationed there. It is guarded around the clock.

The warehouse has lately become an important part in the management of the Wa group's legal and illegal business. It was reportedly used as a site for meetings of senior Wa officials. It has replaced the three-story, three-room wide townhouse located at number 1/10 in Ban Pongthun (left turn from the Thachilek circle and about 400-500 meters away--see accompanying map), which once served as a Wa command post in the area and the meeting place of Wa leaders.

Hong Pang reportedly operates a slaughter house, which is located further down the Thachilek-Kengtung road. The slaughter house supplies meat to markets in the area and reportedly serves as a major amphetamine tablet pressing plant.

The report notes that the Wa is also building a 10-story hotel near the Hong Pang warehouse. The site of the hotel is regarded as an area under influence of the Shan. The parts of the hotel construction which remain to be completed are the walls and outside and inside decoration.

Construction materials were brought from Thailand.

Trading in precious stones is a major business of the Wa in Thachilek. The business is under control of "Ta Wei". The store is located in Ban Pongthun on the Thachilek-Mong Yon road. Compared with other precious stone traders in Thachilek, Ta Wei's trade is done in big lots at value of 30-40 million baht and up. Ta Wei's precious stones are sent to Thai traders in Mae Sai, some of whom are in the Wei Hsueh Kang's network, and other legitimate businessmen to be resold in markets in Thailand and abroad. The report from an intelligence unit in Chiang Rai says although various businesses are supervised by different individuals, "Ta Fa," who is Hong Pang manager, controls every aspect of the overall business. However, so far there is no information to link Ta Fa to supervision of production and trafficking of narcotics in Thachilek, particularly amphetamines, other than the reports that he directs all commercial activities.

Prior to Bang Ron's flight from arrest, there were reports that his narcotics network had contacts with Hong Pang of Ta Fa.

A report from Mae Sai in Chiang Rai Province notes that at least two Thai business groups are regular trading partners of Hong Pang. They are the group of Prasong (family name withheld) and the group of Hia Kui. These groups trade in garlic, smuggled goods from China, among other products.

Meetings with Burma [subhead]

According to a reporter, National Police Commander Police General Pracha Phromnok went to Phuket on 17 August to have an informal meeting with his Burmese counterpart on more effective suppression of narcotics along the Thai-Burmese border. They met on the same issue 3-4 months ago in Rangoon. Pracha disclosed that more clear cooperation resulted from the meeting, as it was Burma's policy to completely eradicate narcotics in 15 years. Also on 17 August in Ranong Province, the Narcotics Control Board [NCB] and the UNDCP [UN Drug Control Program] jointly organized the third meeting on anti-narcotics cooperation along the Thai-Burmese border between the NCB and the Central Committee for Drug Abuse Control [CCDAC], which is the Burmese central agency dealing with narcotics matters. It was a meeting of officials in the operational level, which preceded the 18 August meeting of senior officials. The senior level meeting will be headed on the Thai side by Phayon Phansi, NCB secretary general, and the Burmese side will be led by Police Major General Saw Win, the CCDAC secretary general.

According to Phayon, the senior officials meeting will discuss cooperation in training of Burmese anti-narcotics officials in identification of chemicals and amphetamine precursor materials, as they have very limited knowledge in these areas which causes ineffective identification of amphetamines. The training will also cover inspection of opium cultivation areas. Burma pledged to eradicate opium cultivation in 5 years, provided that it received assistance from other countries and international organizations.

In addition, there will be discussions on exchange of information for narcotics suppression. Phayon said he already had informal discussions with Gen. Saw Win on almost all issues, and Burma agreed on the cooperation. However, there are certain principle issues which have to be discussed at the negotiation table, but there should be no trouble as Thailand and Burma are ready to cooperate to suppress narcotics along their common border.

Phayon said the closure of border crossing points in the north and intensive inspection efforts have resulted in some change in the amphetamine transport routes, to the LPDR and to the west in Kanchanaburi, Tak, and Ranong. Interdiction efforts are in place in those new transport routes, including in Laos. Regarding border crossing point closure to deter amphetamine smuggling, Phayon said his office has focused on this matter, but it has to consult other units that are concerned with trade and investment. The National Security Council is the basic organization that handles this matter.

Burma pledges to apply pressure on the Wa [subhead]

Police Lieutenant General Nophadon Sombunsap, assistant commander of the National Police, said he met with Maj. Gen. Saw Win, the Burmese police chief, on 16 August to discuss cooperation against narcotics along the Thai-Burmese border. There will be improved coordination and exchange of information. Ways to improve the operation of each unit were also discussed. For example, while the Thai police have freedom in narcotics suppression work, the Burmese police have to work with the Burmese military intelligence, which poses some problems.

Regarding narcotics production, Burma acknowledged that minority groups produced amphetamines. For the minority groups which joined the Burmese national development program, such as some Wa groups, Burma pledged to eradicate amphetamines by the year 2005. Pressure will be applied against the Wa groups which refuse to join the program. These groups are big amphetamine producers and engage in combat against Burmese Government forces.

[FBIS Transcribed Text] Big Power Play in The Wa Region [subhead]

Sources claim Was are just pawns of chess which is being played by the bigger powers around them.

Was, once known as vicious head-hunters and, at present, as the biggest drug pushers, are in fact mere puppets for Burma, Thailand, China, and Taiwan, especially the latter two, said sources close to the Wa-controlled areas. "Both of their areas, Pangsang in the north and Mong Yawn in the south, are crowded with Burmese outposts and garrisons, Thai businessmen and workers, and Chinese and Taiwanese who are there with any handy excuses", said one source.

One source reported to SHAN [Shan Herald Agency for News] he saw on 15 August several Chinese, about 70-100 of them, in two six-wheeled trucks on his way from Keng Tung to Tachilek. "The drivers said they were going to Mong Yawn", said the source, "And that hundreds of them are filling up the area of Mong Yawn day by day". Four days earlier another source reported to SHAN of meeting a group of 200 Wa and Chinese, who were traveling from Pangsang to Mong Yawn. Altogether a thousand of them would be coming down between August and September.

It has become a matter of concern for observers when it was reported recently that the Wa leadership in Pangsang has applied to the military government for the inclusion of Mong Ton and Mong Hsat townships in the Wa autonomous region. Both of the townships are located along Thailand's northern most border. The Was had already won agreement from Rangoon to incorporate six townships in the north in their domain. These townships are established along the Chinese border.

An atmosphere of cool relationship exists between Wie Hsueh-Kang, who is wanted by the US and Thai authorities, and the rest of the United Wa

State Army, UWSA, that he had a hand in building up. Wei, who left Khun Sa in 1985 to form the Wa National Council with Ai Hsiao-sir, an ex-militia and ex-Kuomintang commander, had reportedly sent Baht 40 million to Pangsang in 1989, when the newly-established leadership there, after ousting the Burman leadership of the Communist Party of Burma, were facing a financial crisis. He was rewarded by becoming the Commander-in-Chief of the Southern Command. "The good old days are now over", said a source. "Wei now commands only his original group, the 171st Brigade in Banhoong, northeast of Mongyawn where the Southern Command headquarters is".

"He has a Chinese language school for the 500 boys who are under his care. The school was set up with Taiwanese assistance. And the kids salute to the portrait of Chiang Kai-shek, and not Mao Zedung, like the rest of the UWSA is doing".

"Also Wei enjoys an extra-special status in the junta-controlled areas. While the other Wa leaders have to report their visits to the junta authorities, Wei doesn't have to. He can go anywhere he likes at any time and with any number of heavily-armed guards".

Another source agreed. "One other reason for this tense relationship is the $ 2 million reward issued by the United States for Wei. The Pangsang leadership thought they had to distance itself away from him in order to obtain assistance and, more importantly, recognition from the international community".

"The next is that Pangsang no longer has to depend on Wei for their finances. They are already fairly well-off now", added the source.

Another source concluded that a war between the two could very much rested on the Sino-Taiwanese relations, which is currently getting explosive after President Li Teng-hui of Taiwan spoke of a bilateral relations on a state-to-state basis.

Myanmar The Weak Link In The Regional China Containment Policy (Is The Unipolar World A Threat To World Peace)

By Lt. Col. Hla Min
Office of Strategic Studies
Ministry of Defence
Union of Myanmar

In the murky world of internally competing government interest groups, particularly in the U.S. there is a strong lobby for containing China, as China being not only the potential superpower but also already a major world military power rapidly transforming itself into a global economic power. It has become a necessity for U.S. and other western governments to realize this containment policy after the effective demise of Communism and of the superpower rivalry of the cold-war days. There are several sets of operating conditions either in economic sector or in geo-political sphere but in realizing such a policy, one of the approaches to this problem is to influence China's immediate geographical neighbors in taking a more pro-western stance.

Therefore, from the western point of view, Myanmar could be deemed to be the weak link in the regional China containment policy as primarily advocated by the United States. Their attempt in creating Myanmar to become a satellite state of the west by their blatant interference in Myanmar's internal affairs under the much abused and misused pretext of human rights and democracy is quite obvious. It is now widely believed that more pragmatic western analysts are coming to realize that the policies implemented by their respective governments on Myanmar are not nearing in achieving their desired goals and thereby changes in policy formation and implementation are evidently necessary. It is also becoming more obvious that even in the west, especially in the United States, strategic planners and farsighted statesmen have naturally come to realize that the Myanmar affairs have been overplayed creating an overcharged spin where vested interest groups and vote hungry individual politicians have now taken over much of the control. Their superficial, unrealistic, irresponsible and more often cynically voter-oriented views are largely counterproductive and are delaying Myanmar's peaceful transition to a sustainable democracy.

In spite of the constant negative attitude and reports from some Western Governments, Myanmar has undeniably managed to transform itself into one of the most peaceful and stable nations in the world today from -- a not so long ago -- a war torn country. It is in the interests of all the people of Myanmar to maintain the currently existing peace, stability and national unity the nation is enjoying at present and at the same time realistically and responsibly acting to lay the foundation for a democratic system best suited to Myanmar's culture and national security. Unfortunately, there are some observers, both inside and outside the country who are demanding immediate changes. Realistically, new democracies do not automatically succeed. In fact, many failed. They fail when they are built on fragile foundations and unrealistic expectations. But they thrive when they are built on a solid economic base, when the societies are stable, when national security is assured and when there is a constitution suited to the culture and needs of a country. That is why Myanmar views with great concern over the interests of those who are blatantly interfering in Myanmar's internal affairs. If their actions of vested interests become successful, Myanmar will not only be once again spinned into a nation of warring ethnic groups and proxy war but the entire region will also suffer the consequences of being resultant in its destabilization.

Nevertheless, for small and developing countries like Myanmar, it does not have much interest in the containment strategy of the big powers. But the economic, military and political power-balance in totality among the big powers are deemed necessary to maintain a peaceful and stable world. The recent events that took place in Kosovo have become a classic example and trend of the fate of small nations in the unipolar world when the big and the powerful nations if not perforce contained and balanced can become a threat and a thorn to the world peace.

Myanmar is one of the small and developing nations in the world desiring to live in total peace and stability among the nations of the world where the U.N. Charter is respected, honored and implemented by all members without exception. It is also the sole desire of all the small and developing nations in the world not to have the U.N. Charter manipulated and exploited as a tool and a leverage to pressure and force smaller nations in the service of those manipulators' interests obviously leading towards a breakdown of international law.
